How to Make a Fly Trap

Dr. Hodge gives minute description for boys who would aid in cleaning up the city of Cottage Grove

Simplicity is the most remarkable feature of Dr. Hodge's fly trap which he advises the small boys of Eugene to make for use and sale during the present anti-fly crusade.

The trap is made from an empty soap box, of any size available. Knock off the bottom and top or two opposite sides. Then cover these open sides with wire screen netting, making however a "V" or fold lengthwise out of the netting, pointing it inward and upward. For instance, suppose the open end of the box is a foot square. Cut a sheet of netting 13 inches by 18 or 20. This makes the sheet one inch wider and six to eight inches longer than the opening.

Now bend the wire at right angles half an inch on each of the two long edges. This half inch is used to tack the wire to the inside of the box.

Measuring up from the bottom of the sheet of wire a little more than half the height of the opening, fold inward the "V" in the netting. The half inch margin must be cut wherever the bend is made. When the two sides are fastened in with tacks the two V's are opposite each other inside, their edges being two or three inches apart. The netting can be easily cut with an old pair of shears or grass scissors.

The fly crawls up the netting and goes into the "V" up which he crawls until he comes to the crotch. Here a row of holes are punched with a big nail or spike, and when the fly walks up into the end of the "V" he goes through one of these holes and does not come out.

It will be necessary to put a piece from the top of the trap through which the arm can reach to tack the second side of wire on. Through this opening the flies may be emptied when caught. The wire netting for a box a foot square would cost less than 5 cents. The groceryman will give away the box if told that it is to be used for making a fly trap.

The trap, when made, may then be placed in one of several places. It may be left around the kitchen door or near where any refuse is left. It may be baited with some sugar, or animal matter, placed inside. A very good place to set the trap is around the stable. The more expert boy carpenter may make a trap that will exactly fit a window. This will catch the fly both going to and from the cows. Such a trap requires no bait. The trap does not at all have to fit the window, but may be made out of any box left in the window where the flies will pass in and out.

When you have made the trap and wish to sell it, take it around to a neighbor and offer to leave it around the back door or barn, baiting it to catch flies. Then, at the end of the day show how many flies it has caught and perhaps offer to take care of it after you have sold it. It should be worth at least a quarter, if well made.

Dr. Hodge states that boys have made as high as three and four dollars in a day making and selling these traps.

E. K. Miller at the Y. M. C. A. will explain just how to make this trap, if this article does not make its construction clear, or Dr. Hodge at the university will gladly help any boy to learn to make these simple fly traps, which catch more flies than a trap which sells for almost a dollar at the stores.

Pictures of the trap, and diagrams will be found at the Y. M. C. A.—Register.

The Claim Hog

MINING RECORD

It may not be exactly a pleasant subject to touch upon, yet there is value in once in a while taking a whack at the fellow who tries to "hog" every piece of mineral ground open to location in a new camp.

Evidences of his activities are to be found in almost every new camp, the possible exception being in those camps where there has been a great rush and enough of the power of might, the might of public opinion backed by physical force, to make it prudent for the two footed cousin of the hog to remain in the background.

Very seldom does the biped whose characteristics so much resemble those of his quadruped cousin benefit to any great extent from his activities; for where the might of public opinion is strong enough he may well be induced to let go of all claims except those which he really intends to develop, and where he still holds on, the very fact of his controlling so much territory tends to drive away possible buyers.

The purpose in allowing his quadruped cousin to grab so much feed is to fit him that much sooner for the butcher. The biped is apt to perform this office for himself, insofar that he is by his presence tending to drive away those who might otherwise become interested in the new camp.

An instance of this kind in connection with a certain small camp in Colorado. This camp came to notice in the winter, when snows lay deep and no rocks were to be seen beneath the mantle of white. It is stated of this camp that one man became so active as to locate 40 claims, all within a radius of one square mile. On none of these claims did he do any location work, merely erecting stakes, then kept himself busy warning away any prospector who might get in his neighborhood.

When spring freshets came most of his location stakes were washed away, having only been stuck in the snow, those left being 10 or 15 feet above the ground fastened in the branches of a tree. No work whatever has he attempted—and yet he wonders why the new camp is not equaling Cripple Creek or Leadville.

The hog is a useful animal, even though he is only used, as in the hot countries, for a scavenger.

It is a question whether this much may be said of his namesake.

Far better it would be for him to spend his time on one claim than to make himself land poor, and despised as a hog.

Choosing Wealth

OREGON JOURNAL

Dr. Stephen M. Babcock, professor of agricultural chemistry at the University of Wisconsin, retired the other day in comfortable, but not affluent circumstances. His case is worthy of consideration, for immense wealth, was once within his reach. Yet he was not blinded by the prospect; he saw his true relation to the world; he placed service above piled up dollars.

Dr. Babcock will long be remembered as the man who discovered the milk test that goes by his name. It has tremendous possibilities for enriching its discoverer, and when Dr. Babcock announced his invention in 1900 a fortune was at his feet. All he needed was to patent his device. But he did not patent it.

This man who had mapped out a life work to benefit others said his milk test belonged to the world. He said he was only the instrument which produced the invention, that his time and his brains were under contract to the people, that they were entitled to the product of his best endeavor. Dr. Babcock knew the worth of his device; he knew its value to dairymen, but he declined to demand royalties that would gladly have been paid. Instead, he gave his invention to the public, a gift from the university he represented.

Dr. Babcock's milk test has enriched, not only the American farmer, but the nations of the world. He is not one dollar wealthier because of it. The Wisconsin legislature voted him a bronze medal costing $300, but the medal itself has little intrinsic value.

In this age when men seek fame through wealth or power, Dr. Babcock stands a notable exception. He spent twenty-six of his life's best years serving the people. World's expositions have awarded him grand prizes, and yet his most valuable possession is the spirit of brotherhood that prompted him to choose wealth in personal satisfaction rather than wealth in dollars.

Song for Kansas Picnic.

The following has been adopted as the official song for the coming Kansas picnic. Jayhawkers have been requested to take their Sentinels with them and join in the choruses.

Kansas Land.

Tune of Beulah Land
 I've reached the land of corn and wheat,
 And pumpkin pies and potatoes sweet,
 I've got my land from Uncle Sam,
 And now I'm happy as a clam.

Chorus.

O, Kansas, land, sweet Kansas land!
 As on the highest bluff I stand,
 I look away across the plain,
 And wonder why it never rains,
 And when I turn and view my corn,
 I think I'll never sell my farm.

My horses they are Mormon stock,
 My chickens they are Plymouth Rock,
 My cows are Jerseys very fine
 And Poland China are my swine.

Chorus.

And now the railway trains are here
 Which we have wanted many a year
 And won't you with me take a smile
 For we have freighted many miles.
 Chorus.
