PAPERS MUST USE GREAT CARE IN NEWS

LIBERTY OF PRESS MAY NOT BE ABUSED WITHOUT DUE RESPONSIBILITY THEREFOR.

In a democracy it is especially important that the public press should be free, enlightened and accurate. The voters must govern the country by their decision at the ballot box, and to do so intelligently they must have accurate information to guide them. The place of the public prints in our system of government is recognized by the law, which extends to publications the privilege of commenting on public questions and public personages.

Among the firmly established rights of man to which the law lends its protection is the right which every man has to enjoy a good reputation. So it is that the law guards closely a person's reputation and frowns upon anything that is likely to bring a person into disrepute before his fellow men and so injure that reputation. An untruthful statement published in writing, or printing, or pictures, concerning a person which, without justification, injures his reputation is a libel for which the person whose reputation is injured may secure redress in law.

In reference to publications in newspapers a Kentucky judge said: "The public good as well as the usefulness of the press imperatively demand that no publication injurious to a citizen should ever be made unless the publisher knows beyond a reasonable doubt that the statements or charges which it publishes are in fact true. It is a matter of public importance that all statements printed and published in the press of the day should be entitled to full faith and credence and no paper should publish any matter calculated to injure the feelings, business or standing of any citizen unless the same be true."

Every newspaper and magazine strives to attain accuracy, and if it tells the truth it is, generally speaking, absolutely protected. In a few states, as Delaware, Florida, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts and Nebraska, statutes have been passed by the state legislature which do not allow the publication of statements which will injure a person's reputation, even though they be true, unless it be for proper motives. In these few states one may not publish the damaging truth about another if he do so maliciously; but in most of the states the truth may be safely published, no matter what the motives.

Liberty of the press and freedom of speech means simply that the newspaper editor has a right to publish what he will without censorship; they do not relieve from responsibility should the publication be wrongful in the viewpoint of the law. As was said in a Nebraska case, "while the liberty of speech is a sacred right, dear to the hearts of the entire Anglo-Saxon civilization, yet the lawmakers and the framers of constitutions have all realized that liberty in the exercise of any natural right, when unrestrained by law, leads to licentiousness, and have therefore wisely provided that anyone exercising the liberty of speech or press shall be held responsible for any abuse of the privilege."

While a person is carefully protected against injury to his reputation in the private walks of life and in his private business the newspaper has a much wider duty and a much wider privilege in commenting upon persons and events public in their nature. In cases in which the interests of the public as a whole are involved the newspaper has a duty as well as a right to discuss these things so that its readers—members of the public—may be informed and protected. Statements of fact should be accurate but comment and criticism of public matters so long as they are sane and reasonable and the honest opinion of the editor or his publication are justified. Of course, the newspaper is only protected in its criticisms and comments if they are made in good faith and with proper motives. The Michigan court has said: "Newspapers may discuss what relates to the life, habits, comfort, happiness and welfare of the people and in so doing may state facts, draw inferences therefrom, and express views upon the facts. Their deductions, even if false, are not actionable unless they cause special damage."

When a man becomes a candidate for office he throws himself open to fair comment and criticism. The newspaper has the right and the duty to discuss his fitness for the office to which he aspires, and may lawfully communicate facts within its knowledge concerning his character or conduct, and express an opinion upon them and inferences deduced from them, so long as it states as facts only the truth, and as opinion and inferences therefrom only honest belief. This applies to candidates for elective and not appointive office.

Everyone who publishes a book, or publicly exhibits a picture, or presents or takes part in a theatrical or other public performance, or offers to the public an article for sale or engages in some distinctly public enterprise, commits himself to the judgment of the public and the newspaper may comment and criticize. The faults or virtues of the work, may be pointed out to the interested public with impunity so long as the commentator does not step aside from the work, or introduce fiction for the purpose of condemnation.
