In "Prohibition" Cottage Grove picture fans will soon have an opportunity of seeing one of the big things that has been put over recently—a picture as interesting and stirring as a "Billy Sunday Sermon." Free from platitudes it tells the story in six intense reels and holds you spellbound by its thrilling situations. In this big attempt to put over the story of King Booze, the author has symbolized the guiding impulses of our big and little selves, and called them Demon Rum, The Angel of Prohibition, Mephistopheles, and Intelligence. These symbolic figures appear and disappear upon the screen as the minds of the drink enslaved men sway under the impulses of good and evil.
In the story the father drinks like the proverbial fish. That he lives despite his orgies is a physical feat and inspires no imitation. His friend, a talented lawyer, goes to the gutter. The dawn of a new tomorrow breaks upon him; he comes to the top like a rubber ball.
The father has two sons. Both love the same girl. The loser, a despicable character, a jealous demoniac, determines to work upon his younger brother's inherited weakness for drink and finally lands him upon the physical and moral rocks. But love and intelligence triumph in the besotted mind of both father and son and they swear off for good and all.
There are several hotly walloping fights, one between the diabolically plotting brother and his sister-in-law and the final battle in which the schemer is killed. There is conflict all the way through—conflict with the spirits within, with the spirits in the bottles and incarnate spirits who are handy with their fists. It is a picture all should see. It is a picture no one will forget. Those who attended the special exhibition pronounce it one of the strongest films ever produced.

Scene from David Belasco's famous play, "The Girl I Left Behind Me," featuring Robert Edeson and Claire Whitney, as produced by Chas. Frohman. To be shown at The Arcade Wednesday, Sept. 15.
