As to Insults.

The quotation "No gentleman would insult me; none other can," is credited to John Quincy Adams, who is said to have made the reply when he was told that a man had spoken to him so rudely that he ought to send a challenge to a duel, and it is said also to have been used by Senator W. H. Seward in a debate growing out of the assault upon Senator Sumner by Preston Brooks in 1856, but it is pointed out that the quotation

A moral, sensible, well bred man will not affront me, and no other can be found in William Cowper's "Conversation."—Boston Globe.

Those Were the Times.

"The first of our line, Sir Higgleby Piggledy, founded the family fortunes with a grist mill he ran."
"When did he run this grist mill?"
"Back in 1500 or thereabouts."
"Oh, yes. I've often heard that those were the times when knighthood was in flour."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Ought to Sell.

"At last I have perfected it."
"What is the invention?"
"In case your auto hits anything this device makes a cloud of smoke for you to get away in. No chance for identification."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

President to Wed Early in November.

Washington.—President Wilson and Mrs. Galt will be married in the first week of November, probably about November 8. This is the report here, and it seems based on circumstances so convincing as to leave little doubt.

COUNSEL AND CLIENT.

A Lawyer's Right to Defend a Prisoner He Knows to Be Guilty.

Ought an advocate to defend a prisoner whom he believes to be guilty? Mr. Justice Darling in a case in which a solicitor was the plaintiff made some observations on this familiar problem which ought not to go unrecorded. He protested, says the London Globe, against the notion that a lawyer, whether barrister or solicitor, was under an obligation to cease to conduct a case which he realizes to be bad.

"If an advocate in the course of a trial for murder comes to recognize that his client is guilty is he," asked the learned judge, "to say to the court, 'Hang my client?' Judges have seldom asked about the ethics of advocacy in open court. It was, however, in a considered judgment in the court of exchequer that Baron Bramwell made his famous contribution to the discussion.

"A man's rights," said the baron, "are to be determined by the court, not by his advocate or counsel. It is for want of remembering this that foolish people object to lawyers that they will advocate a case against their own opinions. A client is entitled to say to his counsel: 'I want your advocacy, not your judgment. I prefer that of the court.'" Mr. Justice Darling, in the jargon of the courts, concurs.

Laymen have usually been readier than lawyers to discuss the ethics of advocacy. "What do you think of supporting a cause you know to be bad?" Everybody knows Dr. Johnson's reply when Boswell asked him this question. "Sir, you do not know it to be good or bad till the judge determines it."

Less generally known is Sydney Smith's contribution to the discussion. "Justice is found experimentally to be most effectually promoted by the opposite efforts of practiced and ingenious men presenting to the selection of an impartial judge the best arguments for the establishment or explanation of truth. It becomes, then, under such an arrangement the decided duty of an advocate to use all the arguments in his power to defend the cause he has adopted and to leave the effects of those arguments to the judgment of others." This was said in an amusing sermon the famous wit preached at York in 1824.

DARING BELLE BOYD.

Brilliant and Romantic Career of the Famous War Spy.

Stonewall Jackson's valley campaign was one of the great deeds of history. Not since Napoleon's time have men been so dazzled as they were by that great exploit of his. Yet Stonewall might have gone down the valley in defeat had it not been for a little college girl named Belle Boyd.

The Union general, Shields, was quartered at Miss Boyd's house. He held a council of war there. Miss Boyd bored a hole in the floor of her chamber, which was over Shields' room, and lay there with her ear to it throughout the night. The next morning Stonewall Jackson was in full possession of the plans for a great battle and was able to defeat the Union army.

She kept up her valiant work for the Confederates until the Union officers began to suspect her, and Jackson ordered her to move from her Shenandoah home to Winchester. She had been arrested by the federals and had flirted her way to liberty, for she was a pretty girl despite the libelous photographs of her. In Winchester Jackson conferred upon her a commission as captain in the Confederate army. By this time the whole north had become aware of the services she was rendering the Confederacy, and every officer and private was on the alert to get her. Yet she escaped until 1864, when she was caught on a blockade runner. Her captor lost his heart to her, deserted the navy and married her, and the Prince of Wales, afterward Edward VII., attended the wedding.—New York Times.

Encouragement.

He was very bashful, but she liked him and was willing to encourage him, and she saw her opportunity when he said:

"That's a beautiful dog you have there, Miss Ethel. Is he affectionate?"
"Is he?" she answered archly. "Here, Bruno! Here, good dog! Come and show Charlie Smith how to kiss me."—Exchange.

Safety First at Sea.

In nautical parlance the phrase "The three L's" means "lead, latitude and lookout," these being the chief three things to be considered in keeping a ship from running aground.
