The nicest courtesy you can show your guests is to have their visits mentioned in The Sentinel. The nicest courtesy you can show your friends is to let them know of your visits through a news item in The Sentinel. The nicest courtesy you can show the editor is to bring to the office a complete write-up of any news item you know. Let's have courtesy all around.

MEDIATION COMES TO RESCUE

Calling of Greatest Strike in History Is Postponed Temporarily, at Least

Washington, Aug. 9.—Word that the services of the federal mediation board had been accepted today in the threatened strike of 400,000 railroad employes was received with undisguised relief by officials here.

The members of the board went to New York with instructions from President Wilson to do everything possible to avert a strike. They were instructed to keep the white house fully informed of every development. Realizing the serious situation which would confront the country should a strike occur, it is understood the president is ready to exercise all the authority he possesses to bring the employers and employes into agreement.

The success of previous efforts of the mediation board in averting strikes on railroads has led Mr. Wilson to expect confidently that there would be no walk out in the present instance.

He has been prepared, however, to send a personal message to the managers and workers, or to summon representatives of the two sides to the white house.

GOAT RAISING IS PROFITABLE

Willamette Valley Becoming Center of Industry in Northwest.

The Willamette valley is becoming the center of the goat raising industry in the northwest, according to an announcement contained in a bulletin issued by the United States forest service. Goat raising is becoming a more important industry on the Pacific coast generally, and prices of goats and mohair have greatly increased within the last few years. In 1915 over 50,000 goats grazed on the national forests in six states.

The goats are grazed in bands of 600 to 2000, although the smaller herds are more common, and feed mostly on brushy undergrowth. When grown the goats have considerably more agility and courage than sheep, and fight off coyotes and other predatory animals. Unlike sheep, which can go long periods without water, goats must have water frequently, and their range must be planned with this in mind. Nowhere are conditions more ideal for grazing goats than in sections of the Willamette valley and in the western part of Lane county.

Forest officials are not averse to letting goats graze on the national forest. No damage results to the young growth unless the range is overstocked, it is stated. To prevent this a method has been adopted to throw goats onto a new range every day.

Often, it is said, goats are of real benefit to the forests in keeping down inflammable brush and thus aiding in protecting forests from fire.

In the national forests of Oregon and Washington, on the western slope of the Cascades, there are many areas of open brush land suitable for grazing goats. Such areas are found on the Siuslaw, Siskiyou, Crater, Umpqua and Santiam forests in Oregon. These areas would take care of from 20,000 to 25,000 head of goats and are easily accessible from railroad points.

The outlook for the goat industry appears very bright. While the clip from Angora goats has amounted to 500,000 pounds a year in the northwest, the Willamette valley in Oregon being the center of the industry, the value of goats for meat is now becoming an important factor in the industry. Formerly there was much prejudice against goat meat, and although much of it was marketed as mutton, it brought the stockman but $2.50 a head. The latest quotations, however, show $5.50 a head. In southern Oregon a stockman is quoted as saying he can get $4.50 a head for all the goats he could drive to market. Mohair prices, too, have gone up from five to ten cents per pound during the past year.—Eugene Guard.
