This question is answered in two words, "WRONG FOCUS." Suppose your eye is an inch long (from front to rear) then it should have an inch lens system—exactly that, no more, no less. If more you are

"FAR SIGHTED"

and are liable to headaches and dizziness. If less—to the extent of 80%, the twenty-fifth of an inch—you are so that you cannot possibly see well for a distance of more than thirteen inches. Sometimes the lens system of an eye is otherwise imperfect, a little "warped;" then you have

"NEAR SIGHTED"

"ASTIGMATISM"

And all of these defects are corrected with suitable lenses at

Hints on Eyesight

If you have frequent headaches, if you see distant objects clearly, but painfully, or need to hold printed matter nearer to or further from the eye than formerly, or need more light—if you have observed these things—your eyes need the help of correctly made glasses to assist as well as preserve your sight for greater efficiency. Accurately fitted glasses are only possible when the sight has been scientifically tested.
