

From the June 14, 1926 special edition of the Sentinel:
Film Fans Converge on Kingston

Culp Creek, Ore., June 14 - (Special) - Today, the order was "On to Kingston." The same order, perhaps, rang over the rugged hills of Tennessee some 60 odd years ago; but today it was on the picturesque banks of the Row river. Kingston is the Keaton movie town just above Wildwood, some two and one half miles above Culp Creek, on the O.P.&E. railway. Here a depot and a dwelling — a facsimile of an historic Civil war town in Tennessee, was erected. The Keaton company was transported to the scene from headquarters in Cottage Grove on its own trains, one a freight train of Union and Confederate soldiers, the other a passenger train transporting other actors. The early morning looked hardly favorable to good "shooting," but as the day wore on the sky cleared somewhat and several scenes were taken. It is understood that the work now in hand at Kingston will be continued tomorrow, conditions being favorable. Many people from the several sections of the country motored to the place to view the filming, some of them from Eugene.

Large crowds attended the filming at many of its locations, with the only directive being that they not "cast a shadow on the picture."
