at the time for the Red Sox, this was after he retired – and Ted had hired a bunch of kids to come out and he hit probably 400 baseballs that day and the kids would shag them. And Bobby came up to him and said, ‘Boy you’re not going to be good for today’s game,’ but Ted said, ‘Yeah but I will be for a long time after it.’”

In the mid 90s, Watkins even got the chance to meet Williams when Doerr brought him out for a fishing trip on the Rogue River. Williams signed a bat, ball and picture for Watkins. Watkins noted that today a signed Williams bat sells for at least $3,000.

Back at Guaranty, Doerr struck up a friendship with Guaranty’s Shannon Nill and then started holding his birthday party there every year where family, friends and adoring fans would file in to see their hero.

While it was success on the field that brought Doerr and Watkins together, it was Doerr’s attitude and appreciation of life that kept the pair together.

“He was such a gracious person, humble. The grace he had was amazing,” said Watkins.

“Probably the best human being I’ve ever known. He was always treating people with respect.

“He’s just a super human being. I wish we had a lot more like that.”
