BOOHER from A6

House only two months, their progress thus far demonstrates a high potential for more women's success through the program.

Bird was herself a beneficiary of a similar program in Portland five years ago. Homeless and addicted to heroin, Bird went through several treatment programs before Central City Concern provided her with a sober living environment.

"I was provided all the resources I needed to get my life back together," she said. "And when I moved here, there was nothing like that going on and I couldn't believe it."

Establishing the Booher House has been a passion project for the members of Safe Haven, each of whom have personal recovery stories.

"The ladies who run this house on the committee are a great inspiration for anyone who's trying to get clean," said Thompson.

Because of the difficulty in finding qualified housing candidates, however, the nonprofit has eased some of its requirements and dropped rent to $400 a month.

The house still has its own limitations; for instance, there are currently no facilities or staff to care for children, which disqualifies some from residency.

"That breaks our heart when you have to turn anybody away," said Bird.

And while the Safe Haven board has expressed interest in expanding its resources to include housing which accommodates children and eventually transitional housing for men, such goals are still far beyond the purview of financial possibility.

With only two residents, the nonprofit is operating in the red on a monthly basis and fundraising efforts have not been as fruitful as they would have liked.

Despite fundraising shortfalls, Bird is confident that sustainability is within reach, either through community input or taking in more residents.

"If everybody put in a dollar for a bed, we could put somebody off the streets, into a bed and keep them safe enough to get a job," said Bird of future fundraising efforts.

Ideally, Safe Haven will soon take on four more women.

By meeting those goals the Booher House's future as Cottage Grove's transitional housing resource may be secured.

"There's a drastic need in Cottage Grove for this," said Leah. "And if they can help me turn my life around, they can do it for just about everybody."

PakTech beverage handles in a separate bin at home to bring them to the company's site on East Davidson Avenue.

Meanwhile, Borg is searching for ways to make recycling a greater part of the culture.

"I think that's the main thing the future's going to need," he said. "More people that want to use a recycled product, more people that will value recycling it, then more people will start recycling and capturing more and it will just be a kind of self-filling cycle."
