tree lighting downtown. In a collaboration between Main Street Cottage Grove and EcoGeneration, a nonprofit community recycler which receives recycling material at the market, families are invited to bring their children to the Armory on Nov. 23 and Dec. 7 to participate in a luminary project. Materials will be provided to decorate plastic milk jugs which will be filled with sand, illuminated by tea candles and lined along the streets of downtown from All-America Square to City Hall. "We have more than enough milk jugs," said EcoGeneration founder David Gardiepy. "Although if they want to bring milk jugs, we're not opposed to that, either." The milk jug luminaries will be labeled so children can find them and take them home after the event. EcoGeneration is also asking locals to bring more paper bags as part of a children's Christmas gift wrapping activity. While the market's winter season brings some new activities, many of its staples such as the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program and local produce will still be available. "We have a really long growing season here," said Bentson. "A lot of our growers have green houses and cold frames and they continue to have winter crops." Between 15 and 20 vendors are expected to regularly fill the space each Saturday, this year with the addition of local craft chocolate maker Sanity Chocolate. "This is the first time they've joined us here and I think they're going to be here every week," Bentson said. "So that's kind of a big deal."

to drink, can cause a yellow tint to appear in residents' tap water. The mineral deposits can be scoured through the flushing process. The discoloration may show up in residents' tap water when large quantities of water are used, such as in fighting fires and summertime plant watering. This heavy usage can stir up the mineral deposits in the lines and get into household plumbing systems. Several complaints from Cottage Grove residents surfaced in September about a hazy discoloration in people's tap water. City officials maintained that the water had passed quality tests and attributed the discoloration to a spike in house fires that had recently swept through the city. For residents who notice discolored water, the city recommends running cold water until the discoloration has cleared up. During the city's flushing process, the discoloration may be avoided altogether by temporarily refraining from water use. "If they're home and they notice that we're out there, we recommend them not to run water in their house - or try not to," said Public Works and Development Director Faye Stewart. "If you've been off to work and you come home and you know it took place, the first thing you'd do is use your cold water and see if there's any discolor to it."

Residents are warned to avoid doing laundry when flushing is occurring in their area as discolored water can stain fabrics.

As the work continues, residents should receive a detailed description of the flushing process on their water bills, which includes what to do if water appears discolored and a schedule of when flushes are coming to their neighborhood. For more information,
