probably move that direction.”

In keeping with health authority guidelines, the city is testing out a virtual meeting system this week to facilitate the continued operation of public meetings.

Monday night’s City Council meeting is set to proceed on schedule, but without the presence of city leaders. The council chambers will be open to the public, equipped with speakers and a microphone for public comment as city councilors conduct the meeting through the online service GoToMeeting.

Space in the chamber, however, will be limited to allow for required social distancing.

Certain agenda items such as a discussion about parklets have also been postponed for later dates to encourage greater public participation.

City Hall remains open for the time being, but the city has discussed plans to restrict access depending on the severity of a possible future outbreak.

Meanwhile, City Councilor Jake Boone has preemptively elected to self-quarantine for two weeks after a trip to Washington, D.C. last week as part of an Oregon delegation to the National League of Cities’ Congressional Cities Conference.

Following a day on Capitol Hill, Boone learned the Capitol was subsequently closed to the public after a staffer was confirmed to have COVID-19.

“I decided I would err on the side of caution rather than be the guy that brings it home,” said Boone. “It’s incumbent on me to make sure I’m not helping the thing spread because, while it may just leave me with an annoying cough, older folks or people with immunodeficiencies — it can kill them with very little difficulty.”

Boone hoped his decision would serve as a precautionary tale for the rest of the community.

“If you suspect you have it or that you might have it, self-quarantine and take it seriously,” he said. “Don’t do it half-way. Do it completely. Because that’s how we’re going to stop this thing.”

Otherwise, the regular operations of city infrastructure remain relatively unchanged besides the implementation of extra precautions.

While the city was informed that the coronavirus can survive through the city’s wastewater collection system, Meyers said, it does not survive the treatment process. Employees at the plant have been instructed to wear protective equipment and turn down the force of some machinery to reduce risk from splash or airborne particles.

Meyers also assured that drinking water will remain unaffected.

“The drinking water that we provide will still remain safe drinking water and we are preparing to make sure that continues,” he said.

On the issue of water disconnection notices for those behind payment on their water bills, Meyers recommending following the city’s usual protocol: contact the city.

“If there are some [bills] that are going to be difficult, we will work them and set up a payment plan to do that,” he said.

Pacific Power, meanwhile, announced on March 12 that the electricity provider “is temporarily suspending disconnections and late fees for non-payment for customers in Oregon, Washington and California to support the state of emergency declared in all three states in response to the COVID-19 virus.”

Other area electricity providers Emerald People’s Utility District and Lane Electric Cooperative did not respond to calls regarding their disconnection welcome from community leaders and partners who work tirelessly to ensure our students and families have their basic needs met.

“While we face huge global and social challenges, the South Lane School District will stand on the firm foundation already in place and ensure our students graduate with the knowledge, skills and dispositions required for them to advance to careers, college, citizenship and healthy lifestyles becoming our leaders of tomorrow.”
