PRAYED FOR WINNINGS.

Death of an Old-Time Chicago Gambler Brings Out a Story.

Chester Johnson, an old Chicago gambler who flourished in Chicago about the era of the great fire, died the other day. He was familiarly known as "Old Chet," and many old stories are told of him. The following, according to the Chicago Chronicle, was related by one of his cronies in a crowd of his intimates, who were talking of the dead man. One of them turned to another and said: "Bill, tell us that time with the preacher."

In a husky voice, broken by asthmatic wheezings, "Bill" entered on his task.

"It wasn't long after the big fire. Most of the churches had been wiped out. Some of them were struggling up, but the generality of them had pretty hard sledding. Finally one of them—I don't like to mention no names—comes out in the papers and the committee of elders or whatever it was allows popular subscriptions to a building fund is about what they need. The thing touches off mighty slow; don't seem like it's going to be a general conflagration, anyhow. Finally the gospel coach gets stuck at about 3,000 bones and it looks like the mud is so deep it can't be pulled out."

The speaker halted and made a significant gesture to someone who stood in the little room behind him. There was a decorous clinking of ice against glass, "Bill" turned around a moment, threw back his head, wiped his lips with the back of his hand and resumed: "Right then was when 'Old Chet' came sharp to the fore. He goes to the parson of this here burned out synagogue and tells him that if he will do 'em any good he can have three days' profits of both his banks. 'Chet' was running two games himself at that time, faro, the old twenty-eight wheel, chuch-a-luck, about the whole thing, and they were kept up nights counting coin to the good. 'Only,' says 'Chet,' to the preacher man, 'If we go into this game the institution will have to have the prayers of the congregation.'

"Well, that threw the parson up in air. He hemmed and he hawed. He frowned and he smiled by turns. 'Old Chet' wouldn't budge. He stood pat on the proposition and made the preacher man come to time.

"'You pray for rain when you want rain, don't you?' he says: 'Sure we do,' says the man in black.

"'Well, this is a case of rain,' says 'Old Chet.'

"'I reckon I'll have to see what can be done,' says the preacher. 'I'll lay the matter before the folks. Anyway, Mr. Johnson, I'm much obliged to you. I'll let you know.'

"Well, they had some kind of a meeting of the directors, or whatever it was, and I understand there was a violent rattle, but the preacher he wins out. One day he steps down the street and he finds 'Old Chet' and he says: 'Mr. Johnson, we've decided that anything is right in a good cause. If you'll play your best we'll pray our best.'

"'Let her go,' says 'Old Chet.' 'And she went. The thing got noised around and business was terrific. People used to come and lost just to help the receipts. There never was such a game before or since. When three days was up 'Old Chet' hustles all the winnings into a gunny sack, jumps into a hack and drives out to the parson's house. It's Saturday night, or, rather, it's Sunday morning. He wakes the preacher up and there in his studio they spent two hours a-counting it. Say, I tell you boys it had rained sure."

"How hard did it rain, Bill?" asked a young man in the corner who was pulling upon a cigarette. "About $14,000 worth," said Bill. "If you knew where to look you could go and see that church they built yet."
