BOER AND BRITON.

History of the Trouble Which Led to War in the Transvaal.

THE BOERS.

In the olden days of the English and the Boers, as in so many other cases, it may be said that, though separated by a technical barrier, the English and the Boers were really related by common interests in one necessary article for their domestic wants, the ground and the climate of the two were widely dissimilar.

The great gold fields in the Transvaal are the material facts that have caused the conditions for the present struggle from the English point of view. The English have sold to the Boers. In other words, the English have sold to the Boers. In previous columns, we have shown that the Boers are the chief exploiters of the English.

The conditions for the latter is the chief exploiters of the English.

The conditions for the present struggle in the Transvaal, from the English point of view, are based on the conditions for the present struggle in the Transvaal, from the English point of view, are based on the fact that the Boers are the chief exploiters of the English. The English have sold to the Boers. In other words, the English have sold to the Boers. In previous columns, we have shown that the Boers are the chief exploiters of the English.

The conditions for the present struggle in the Transvaal, from the English point of view, are based on the fact that the Boers are the chief exploiters of the English. The English have sold to the Boers. In other words, the English have sold to the Boers. In previous columns, we have shown that the Boers are the chief exploiters of the English.

The conditions for the present struggle in the Transvaal, from the English point of view, are based on the fact that the Boers are the chief exploiters of the English. The English have sold to the Boers. In other words, the English have sold to the Boers. In previous columns, we have shown that the Boers are the chief exploiters of the English.