MASTER AND SERVANT.

A journal which is not in the least in sympathy with anarchist opposes the suggestion that more effective protection be offered our Presidents and high officials with the remark that "the servants of the people should not be greater than their masters." It is a mere figure of speech that the President of a republic is a servant of the people. A President serves the people in the same sense that the head of a monarchical government serves his people. The President is chosen for a term of years, while a monarch serves for life, unless his term is cut short by revolution. A President's national policy is subject to reversal by the people when the term for which he was chosen has expired, but in the meantime he can bring many influences to bear to coerce his masters. He is commander-in-chief of the army and navy; he has the selection under the law of the officers of these two departments of service, and has the distribution of several hundred millions of the people's money each year. It is absurd to speak of an official who can select one of his masters for high and highly remunerative office as a servant. But it is in the interest of the masters rather than of their so-called servant that adequate protection should be afforded the President and other high officials. It can hardly be expected that a form of government will endure which does not provide for its own permanency. If in a republic the relation between the head of the Government and the people is such that the head cannot be properly protected, a demand will arise for a form of government that will not be exposed to changes which must result from frequent attacks upon the existing order of things. The business interest of a country require permanency, and industry only prospers when the business interests feel secure.—S. F. Bulletin.

MOLASSES AS CATTLE FOOD

Mixed With Hay or Grass It is an Excellent Remedy for Asthma.
 Many agriculturists in Europe have long been convinced that molasses is an admirable food for horses and cattle, and their conviction is stronger than ever, owing to certain experiments which have been recently tried, and which have proved eminently successful. Unfortunately, in some countries, farmers have practically been debarred from using molasses in this way, owing to the fact that there is a duty on all saccharine material, but now, in France, at least, steps have been taken to remove this obstacle, and furthermore, the French Government has publicly notified agriculturists that it will do all in its power to aid them in popularizing the new food.
 The most notable experiments with molasses have been made by M. Decrombecque, a chemist, and M. Manneche, a veterinary surgeon at Arras. They assert that chopped hay or grass mixed with molasses is an excellent cure for asthma, and, furthermore, that food of this kind neither loads the stomach nor impedes respiration. They also think it likely that during digestion the sugar in the food produces alcohol, and they say that, if so, the animal's health is bound to be benefited thereby.
 Two other experts, MM. Dickson and Malpeaux, have also made experiments in regard to the effect of molasses on the general health, weight and milk of animals, and they have arrived at the following conclusions:
 First—That ordinary food mixed
