PROSECUTOR WENT TOO FAR AND LOST CASE

In the group of men gathered in the corner of the club cafe there was one whose white hair and mustache in marked contrast to his ruddy face, stood for long experience of life. If there was something in his striking appearance which attracted the attention of men coming into the cafe or passing through it, there was also that in his conversation which held the attention of those who were within sound of his voice.

They had been talking about the changed conditions which obtain in the practice of the law nowadays as compared with a time which, in the actual number of years involved, was far from long ago. In those times, one of the younger men said, the lawyers who have the great reputations, who earn incomes, are rarely seen in trial courts. It is as counsel that they have shown their strength. Their work is done in the quiet of their secluded offices, and agility or resourcefulness in the actual rough-and-tumble of the jury trial has not been the basis of their success.

'It is all very much changed from the time when I was in active practice,' said the white-haired old man. 'In those days the great lawyer was the great pleader, and by that I mean the man who was the great power with juries, not the man strong in argument before the supreme court. It was the trial lawyer, the man who was always ready for any sort of emergency that might arise, who was never taken by surprise by anything that the other side might do, who had been through the opposing side of the case as well as his own—he was the fellow who won the big cases and earned the large fees.'

'I shall never forget a case which I saw tried in this city a good many years ago. It was a criminal case, the defendant being charged with murder in the first degree. Two of the cleverest lawyers then at the New York bar met in that trial. One was the district attorney, the other the counsel for the defense. I remember the delight with which I followed the case as the trial progressed, and I noted how very thoroughly each man had foreseen what the other would do and prepared himself to meet it.'

'There was no question about the killing. The defendant had shot a man twice, and both bullets had gone through the heart. The defendant was a young man who had lived rather a wild life, but he was not at heart a bad man. He declared that the shooting had been entirely in self defense. The dead man was much larger and stronger than he, and at the time of the shooting the defendant was just recovering from a long and serious illness.'

During this illness he had been cared for by a woman who had had an affair with the other man. This man came to their house one evening and attacked the woman with his fists, beating her severely. The defendant interfered and the larger man turned on him. Then the young man shot.'

'There was a perceptible interval between the two shots, and it was the contention of the district attorney that in that interval the young man had time enough to realize fully what he was doing and to determine deliberately to kill his antagonist. Upon that contention the district attorney relied for a conviction of murder in the first degree.'

'The one witness who could give direct testimony as to the shooting was the woman. She was arrested at the same time as the defendant. In fact, they surrendered together, going to the police station and notifying the police of what had occurred. They were held in jail during the time before the trial, and while there both were converted and joined the methodist church.'

'The trial proceeded rapidly and the prosecution made out a fairly good case. The woman had not been indicted, and at the last the prosecution decided not to call her as witness. The district attorney had become convinced that she was entirely on the side of the defendant and he preferred to try to break the force of her testimony on cross-examination. He had discovered that she had had a checked career, and he figured on being able to show the facts from her own lips in such a way as to discredit her.'

'The woman was put on the stand by the defense, and she told a simple straight story of the shooting, which bore out the contention of the defendant. Then she was turned over to the district attorney for cross-examination. He had her go over the matter again in the old detailed way that so many lawyers employ, trying to read the story out so thin that it would lose force. Then he began to make no objections to any of his questions, and now, as the first one bearing on her past life was asked, the senior counsel for the defendant rose to speak. But the judge was a little before him and was already instructing the witness that she need not answer any question the answer to which might, in her opinion, tend to incriminate or degrade her.'
