The RED STORM
Or the Days of Daniel Boone
By JOEL ROBINSON

CHAPTER VI
After leaving the fort, the hunters were not long in making their way back to the Indian agency. They were looking for some information of the Indian chief, who had promised to assist them in finding a path through the wilderness. The hunters arrived at the agency and were greeted by the chief. He informed them that the French trader, who had been captured by the Indians, was still held captive in a nearby settlement.

The hunters were determined to rescue their friend and set him free. They decided to form an alliance with the Indians to achieve their goal. The chief agreed to assist them, provided they promised to help the Indians in their battles against the English.

The hunters and the Indians were able to coordinate their efforts and successfully rescued the French trader. With his help, they were able to navigate through the wilderness and reach their destination safely.

In the meantime, the French trader had been able to gather information about the English settlement and their military capabilities. This knowledge was crucial in helping the hunters plan their strategy for the upcoming battle.

The hunters and the Indians then set up a camp near the English settlement and waited for the right moment to strike. The English were caught off guard and were quickly defeated.

The hunters and the Indians then shared the land and resources, settling down to live in peace. The French trader remained with them, providing them with valuable knowledge and guidance.

The RED STORM had passed, but the memories of the bravery of the hunters and the Indians would be remembered for generations to come.