CHAPTER XXI—(Continued)

"We'll never have to regret anything that we did. Our lives will have been spent in doing good to others and whenever we do our part, we'll have no reason to feel that we have been under any obligation to anyone else," he said.

"But we must not forget to be kind to each other," she added, "and to help those who need our assistance."

"And we must always be true to our friends," he replied.

"Yes," she said, "true to our friends, true to our family, and true to ourselves."

"And we must always be ready to help those in need," he continued.

"And we must always be humble and modest," she added. "We must never think that we are better than anyone else, for we are all equal in the sight of God."

"And we must always be patient and忍耐," he said. "We must never lose our temper, for anger is a sin."

"And we must always be careful to do what is right," she said.

"And we must always be grateful for what we have," he replied. "We must never take anything for granted, for we do not know what the future may hold for us."

"And we must always be ready to forgive those who wrong us," she said. "We must never hold grudges, for grudges only make us bitter."

"And we must always be true to our principles," he added.

"And we must always be true to our convictions," she said. "We must never allow anyone to make us change our minds, for our minds are our own, and we must always be true to ourselves."

"And we must always be true to our faith," he said. "We must always believe in the Lord and in His word, and we must always strive to live according to His teachings."

"And we must always be true to our duty," she said. "We must always do our best to serve the Lord and to help others, for it is our duty to do so."

"And we must always be true to our obligations," he replied. "We must always do our best to fulfill our promises, for promises are sacred, and we must always keep our word.

"And we must always be true to our families," she said. "We must always support our families, and we must always love and care for our children, for they are our greatest treasure."
