Millions in Farm Mortgages

Western farmers have grown rather particular about their indebtedness. One of the common requirements of the modern mortgage is that the mortgagor shall accept any portion of the principal at the time of any interest payment. This means that the harvesting of a good wheat crop, or the fortunate sale of a bunch of cattle, may wipe out the debt and the loan agent must find another borrower. However one insurance company has $40,000,000 in Western farm mortgage loans, and the interest thereon is sufficient to pay all its death losses. Another company has $99,000,000 in their loans, scattered over the Mississippi valley. The larger sums are in Illinois, with about $28,000,000; Minnesota, $10,000,000; Missouri, $10,000,000; Iowa, $10,700,000; Ohio, $8,000,000 and lesser amounts in a dozen other states. It places approximately 4,000 farm mortgage loans every year, and has in its history loaned $250,000,000 in this way. A report in the Annals of the Academy of Science gives the amount of mortgages held by the life insurance companies of $499,632,508 or 27.7 percent of the companies' assets. This, however, includes loans on city property as well as those on farms. The percentage is second only to that invested in bonds, indicating the partiality for this form of investment by the most conservative of investors.

The insurance company loan is safe-guarded in every possible way. The inter-estories of the application cover four large pages, and include everything from the borrower's family to the use he proposes to make of the money. They even inquire into his habits and his standing in the community; for the well-informed investor realizes that the best part of his security is the personality of the borrower.

Thus, it happens that the insurance companies have few foreclosures and practically no losses on this class of investments. Of recent years the value of land has increased so rapidly that every loan made, as these investments are, on a basis of 40 percent, of real value—became "gift-edged," and was the best possible security. From "The Farm Mortgage of Today," by Charles Moreau Harger, in the American Monthly Review of Reviews for May.
