CHAPTER IV.

After the meeting, the group of old friends had returned to the lodge. The bar was open and lively, with music playing in the background. As they chatted and enjoyed their drinks, Mr. Morgan approached them, a smile on his face.

"I have a favor to ask, gentlemen," he said. "I own a vineyard in Napa Valley and I need help with the harvest. Would any of you be interested in spending a week with me and assisting in the wine-making process?"

They all looked at each other, considering the offer. Finally, Mr. Clark spoke up.

"I think I can make it work," he said. "I have a vacation planned in the area, so this would be a perfect opportunity to learn more about the wine-making process."

The others nodded in agreement, and they all exchanged phone numbers and made plans for the upcoming week. As they walked away, Mr. Morgan shook their hands and thanked them for their help.

"I appreciate your generosity," he said. "This will be a valuable experience and I look forward to working with you all."

They all drove back to their homes, excited about the upcoming week and the prospect of working with Mr. Morgan on his vineyard. They had no idea what adventures lay ahead of them.