THE IRON PIRATE
A Plain Tale of Strange Happenings on the Sea
By MAX PEMBERTON

CHAPTER XI

The ship was now ten miles off the coast of the American mainland. The men on board had been at sea for weeks and were becoming restless. They had been forced to rely on their provisions and had not seen land for days. The crew was in a state of high spirits and were looking forward to the arrival of the next supply ship.

The skipper, Mr. Marlow, was a strict but fair captain. He had been at sea for many years and knew well how to handle his crew. He was a skilled sailor and was respected by all on board.

The ship was well-equipped and was in good condition. It had been built by the best shipbuilders in Europe and was well-insured. It was a large vessel, and could carry a large cargo. It was well-armed and had a good crew.

The crew was made up of experienced sailors and had been chosen for their skills and experience. They were all well-trained and knew their job well.

The ship was well-maintained and was in good condition. It had been well-built and was able to withstand the rough seas of the ocean. It was well-armed and had a good crew.

The crew was well-equipped and was in good condition. They had been trained and were able to handle the ship well. They were well-equipped and could handle any situation that arose.

The ship was a fine vessel and was well-equipped for its mission. It was well-built and was able to withstand the rough seas of the ocean. It was well-armed and had a good crew.

The crew was well-trained and knew their job well. They were well-equipped and were able to handle the ship well. They were well-equipped and could handle any situation that arose.

The ship was a fine vessel and was well-equipped for its mission. It was well-built and was able to withstand the rough seas of the ocean. It was well-armed and had a good crew.

The crew was well-trained and knew their job well. They were well-equipped and were able to handle the ship well. They were well-equipped and could handle any situation that arose.