THE CHARITY GIRL
By EFFIE A. ROWLANDS

CHAPTER XIV—(Concluded.)

Now, and smith and Hildy came to join the engagement. Jack wished for his plans to be so far advanced that the morning of the wedding was nothing but an assurance of a successful marriage. But a month passed, and a return of the sultry heat of summer brought with it the thought that it was time to get the wedding out of the way. So, as an example of what could be done, the plan was carried out, and the marriage was celebrated in the way that seemed to suit Mr. Beverley and Mrs. Boderick.

They had no formal plans of their own, and when, at last, the word of marriage was pronounced, they were only thankful for the blessing that had brought them together. They were happy to think that their future would be a success, and that the wedding was but a step towards a new life. They had not wanted much from the marriage, but they were well satisfied with what they had. They were happy in their love for each other, and they were content with the life that was before them.

The ceremony was a simple one, and was held in the town hall. The bride and the groom were in their best clothes, and the wedding gown was all in white. It was a beautiful dress, with a long veil that reached to the floor. The groom was wearing a black coat and a black hat. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Mr. Beverley, and the bride and groom were declared husband and wife by him.

From the town hall they went to the church, and the guests were gathered there. They were all sitting in the pews, and the bride and groom were standing in the aisle. The guests were singing a song, and the bride and groom were listening. It was a beautiful day, and the sun was shining brightly. It was a day of rejoicing, and the guests were all very happy.

As the guests left the church, they were all very pleased with the wedding. They were all very kind to the bride and groom, and they were all very glad to see them. They were all very satisfied with the way that the wedding had been conducted, and they were all very pleased with the way that the bride and groom had been received by their friends. They were all very pleased with the way that the wedding had been celebrated, and they were all very satisfied with the way that the bride and groom had been received by their friends.