The Charity Girl
By Effie A. Rowlands

CHAPTER XXXV

The next morning was a beautiful day. The sun shone bright and warm, and the sky was clear. Jack and Audrey sat on the steps of the charity building, enjoying the sunshine and the fresh air. They had been up early, and were feeling fresh and happy.

"I wish we could stay here all day," said Audrey. "I love this weather."

"Me too," said Jack. "I wish we could stay here all day."

They talked about the recent events and the future plans for the charity. They discussed the problems they had faced and the solutions they had found. They laughed and joked, and the time passed quickly.

"I hope that things will get better," said Audrey. "I really do. I think that we can make a difference, if we work hard and stay focused."

"I agree," said Jack. "I think we can make a difference."

They continued to talk, and the day passed quickly. When they finally went inside, they were both tired but satisfied. They knew that they had made a difference, and they were proud of themselves for doing so.

The sale of the orangewines had been a success, and the money raised would be used to support various charitable causes. The couple was grateful for the support they had received, and they looked forward to continuing their work. As they walked into the building, they were greeted by a chorus of applause and cheers. They smiled and waved, feeling proud and happy.

The day had been a success, and the couple was grateful. They knew that they could make a difference, and they were excited to continue their work. As they walked into the building, they were greeted by a chorus of applause and cheers. They smiled and waved, feeling proud and happy.