Hill and Herriman Roads Agreed Upon Territory.

HAYWOOD'S Announcement.

The announcement of the opening of the new territory, made by Joseph H. Haywood, who has been appointed by the Federal Government as Commissioner of the Oregon Territory, was received with much interest by the inhabitants of the Valley. The Commissioner stated that the Territory would be opened to settlement on the first day of the month, and that the inhabitants of the Valley would be entitled to the benefits of the treaty that had been made with the Indians.

The Commissioner also stated that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Commissioner further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Commissioner also announced that the Territory would be opened to settlement on the first day of the month, and that the inhabitants of the Valley would be entitled to the benefits of the treaty that had been made with the Indians.

The Commissioner also stated that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Commissioner further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

I.

The Oregon Territorial Legislature was in session, and the Governor was inaugurated by the President of the Senate, who administered the oath of office. The Governor then addressed the Legislature, in which he declared that the State of Oregon was in a prosperous condition, and that the people were looking forward to a bright future.

The Governor also stated that the Territory would be opened to settlement on the first day of the month, and that the inhabitants of the Valley would be entitled to the benefits of the treaty that had been made with the Indians.

The Governor expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.

The Governor also announced that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Governor further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Governor also expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.

The Governor also announced that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Governor further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Governor also expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.

The Governor also announced that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Governor further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Governor also expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.

The Governor also announced that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Governor further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Governor also expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.

The Governor also announced that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Governor further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Governor also expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.

The Governor also announced that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Governor further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Governor also expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.

The Governor also announced that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Governor further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Governor also expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.

The Governor also announced that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Governor further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Governor also expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.

The Governor also announced that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Governor further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Governor also expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.

The Governor also announced that the Territory would be divided into two districts, one of which would be known as the "North District," and the other as the "South District." The line of division would be run from the mouth of the Columbia River to the mouth of the Willamette River, and from thence along the coast line to the head of the Columbia River.

The Governor further stated that the Territory would be divided into counties, and that the first county would be known as the "Columbia County." The county would be bounded on the north by the Columbia River, on the east by the Willamette River, on the south by the coast line, and on the west by the mountains.

The Governor also expressed his confidence in the future of the Territory, and stated that he would do all in his power to promote its welfare and development.