WEDNESDAY, Dec. 19, 1907.

The showing made by twenty-nine National banks in this state outside of Portland is ample and unmistakable evidence that the financial interests of the various sections of Oregon represented in the table are in the hands of conservative men. With an average cash reserve of 4 per cent of the deposits of $12,150,000, nearly $1,000,000 of United States bonds to secure circulation, and an additional $1,500,000 of United States and other bonds, it is not to be wondered that the "country banks," as they are termed, have in most cases been increasing their deposits at a time when there have been heavy withdrawals from the larger institutions in the cities.

It seems clear that the National banks outside of Portland, including the sixteen not heard from by The Oregonian, hold, exclusive of all other collateral, cash and United States bonds to secure circulation to the extent of fully $10,000,000. In the face of such a showing it is easy to understand the difficulty that would be encountered in starting a run on any of these conservatively conducted institutions. Even in far-away Burns, in one of the most remote regions of the state, the two banks have $250,000 cash on hand and their deposits have increased $76,000 since August. These country banks have stood the strain and actually increased their deposits and strengthened their reserves at a time when the suspicious depositors of the big cities were drawing out money and hiding it in deposit vaults. It does not necessarily reflect on the less fortunate banker of the big city that his depositors should lose confidence at a time when the confidence of the country depositors remains unimpaired.

Environment is undoubtedly a contributing factor in the retention of confidence in the smaller city. There the banker is personally acquainted with practically all of his patrons and opportunity to keep in reasonably close touch with all that is going on is much greater than it is in the big cities. The country banker might directly steal the funds of his depositors, but the possibility of the Lafe Pence and Gus Lowits securing them in wholesale quantities would be much more remote than they would be in the larger cities. When some country Cooper Morris on a small salary began too rapid an accumulation of big automobiles, suspicion would be aroused and a halt called before it was too late.

The solidity of the banks outside of Portland has been demonstrated beyond question. The same is true of the banks which have successfully weathered a storm in Portland. Now that the actual condition of all these institutions has been disclosed and shown to be perfectly healthy, it will be advisable for the boarders to withdraw from the stockings, tenpots and safety deposit vaults the money which should be in circulation, earning something for its owners and facilitating business for good, responsible borrowers who have security of unquestionable value.—Oregonian.
