IN the last couple of years the hand embroidery craze has been spreading until now every woman who cares to make a good appearance, without being extravagant, appreciates these dainty little touches to her garments which hand embroidery adds. The work itself is very fascinating, and many a dull and tedious hour during the winter months can be spent very profitably on this kind of work, and any one can render themselves proficient in this kind of needle craft with due persistence and a little time. No wardrobe is complete nowadays without one or two pieces of clothing bearing this evidence of daintiness, and to make everything as simple as possible we are offering our readers of this page a pattern which can be very easily transferred to any kind of fabric or wood, and which should appeal to every economical woman, in the fact that it would make a clear, clean-cut pattern twelve or more times. We will be pleased to furnish our readers with these patterns for the sum of ten cents in stamps or coin, and would be glad to have them give it a try-out and see if it is not the most convenient they have ever used, as well as the most economical.

The Pleiades and Hyades

Written for this Magazine.

WHEN you look at the Eastern sky in the early evening in November you will notice a small group of stars covering a space a little greater than that occupied by the new moon. All are intensely white, but they are of low magnitude for the most part and seem to shine through a kind of veil of suffused light. There are six stars readily visible to the naked eye on a clear night. Persons of exceptionally good eyesight may see from one to five more. There is an ancient legend which was current among the Greeks that the Pleiades were seven sisters, who for their goodness and beauty were placed among the stars. One of them, however, loved a mortal and, in consequence, retired ashamed from view. Hence, no more than six afterward were visible. How this legend originated would require more space for discussion than may be given here. It is enough to say that those persons who declare that they can see the seventh star are by no means agreed as to which is the star of the several hovering on the edge of naked-eye visibility. They often still are called the Seven Sisters. A good opera glass will show about twenty stars.

One star, brighter than the rest, is named Alcyone.

A small telescope will show additional stars, until, in the great observatory telescopes, no less than two thousand are to be seen. Observations begun more than sixty years ago and patiently followed, showed, when about fifty years had passed, that there was an actual association among the stars, that is, that they are revolving about each other. The displacement was of the very slightest after those years, so slight, in fact, that it could not be measured, answering to what is called, in chemistry, a trace. It is clear from this that the evolution must take a vast period of time, numbering tens of thousands of years. When we reflect further on the giant masses of these distant suns and reflect that even at a distance of thousands of millions from each other, the revolutionary movements must be many miles a second, we may gain some idea of the stupendous scale on which is constructed this object which glitters as an ornament to our autumn skies. The whole group, or at least a great part of it, is wrapped in glowing hydrogen. The name Pleiades, notwithstanding the pretty legend, is derived from Greek pleion "sail," from the fact that the easily recognized group was of great use to the sailors in those days before the magnetic compass. From the earliest days they were noted and many religious observances marked their appearance in the evening sky. The Hallowe'en observances and, stranger still, the date we have chosen for our November elections, may be traced to the ancient regard for the Pleiades.

The Pleiades belong to the constellation Taurus, the second constellation of the zodiac. Following them, at about an hour's interval, is the sister group, known as the Hyades. This is a V-shaped figure, having at the end of one arm the great red star Aldebaran. The Hyades were sisters of the Pleiades, according to the ancient legend, and were foster-mothers to Bacchus, after the death of his own mother. Aldebaran is receding from us at the rate of thirty miles a second, but being already more than a hundred million miles away from us, its rate of recession will not make any difference in appearance for very many thousands of years. The star next to Aldebaran is one of those rarities, a naked-eye double. That is, it appears as a single star on ordinary occasions, but on exceptionally clear nights it is shown as a pair of glittering stars very close together. The whole group is extremely beautiful and interesting and well repays study.
