UNDER ODD FELLOWS' HALL

A Hedge of Goldenrod and Asters

If the goldenrod were a rare flower and cost a dollar as pray it would quickly become more popular than many of the present hot-house-bred fads of society. But it is not one whit the less beautiful because it is common; just go out into the fields this afternoon, and pick a single spray, examine it carefully, and then ask yourself if you know any garden-plant so truly beautiful as this wonderful flower of gold. And if you wish to make in your garden the most beautiful hedge you ever saw, I'll tell you how to do it. Go out into the fields while the goldenrods and tall purple asters are at their best, and with pieces of tape or in any other way mark a number of the finest clumps, selecting, if possible, those of about equal height. Then in the late fall, when the season of bloom is over, dig up those roots, and transplant them to your garden. Set them out in a row, alternating the goldenrod with the asters, and so close together that there will be no gaps when they are in bloom next year. A double row is still better, and the most beautiful hedge I have ever seen was made thus by setting out these plants on either side of a well-kept garden path. I am not usually in favor of the uprooting of wild flowers, but as the United States boasts of some eighty-five species of goldenrod, and perhaps twice as many kinds of asters, and as these flowers fairly carpet the earth in the fall, the number which we shall take for our hedges will never be missed.—Harnest Harold Baynes in the September Woman's Home Companion.

The pills that are potent in their action and pleasant in effect are Dr. Witt's Little Early Risers. W. S. Philpot, of Albany, Ga., says: "During a bilious attack I took one.
