

lar vices, and especially in those who administered the laws. His tongue seemed to be loosed, and he cried aloud and did not spare in telling them of their sins. The next morning quite early he received a note from Jackson, by a servant, requesting him to call at his room at the hotel immediately after breakfast. He did not know what was to come: he might be called to account for his bold discourse of the day before. He went, however, and was met most cordially by the Judge, who said he had sent for him to thank him for his boldness in rebuking the popular sins and follies of the day. "I want you to go across the street to my tailor, and let him take your measure for a suit of clothes; the best that he has in his shop. I do this as an expression of my appreciation of your honesty and fearlessness in reproving wickedness in high places, and as an encouragement for you to continue the same course."—DR. PRATT, in N. Y. Observer.

The Little Snowflakes.

A princess in France, who had come from a colder clime, grew tired of all the pleasures prepared for her and longed to have a sleigh-ride once more in her own country. The king, who tried to please all her whims, had a long street prepared one night for such a ride. How do you suppose he tried to imitate snow? He had many thousands of pounds of salt and sugar sifted along the ground, and the next day took her out for a sleigh-ride over its surface. It was only a poor imitation at best, and it cost a great deal of money and labor. Even a king could not cover a single field with snow.

Yet how easily the Creator covers a whole country with this white mantle! How small the means he uses! How little one snowflake can do! And yet it is just the snowflakes that do it. As you look out of the window some winter's day you can see it settling softly over the black ground, hiding everything rough and unsightly, blanketting warmly thousands of little plants that are to spring up with April rain.

Now, if you could only see the good that would follow if all the children began to work for Jesus, I am sure you would wish to begin to-day and ask every little neighbor to join you. Remember how much the snowflakes do, and "are ye not much better than they?"—Olive.
