

Guns: New bill infringes on Second Amendment

Background checks are already done when a firearms purchase is made online, also, Jobe said.

"That gun (bought online) has to be transferred to a firearms dealer," he said. "Then you have to do a background check before you can get said gun."

Putting the burden of background checks in local gun shops would be significant, Jobe noted.

"It puts a lot more paperwork on our end," he said. "If a lot of people are doing it (selling guns), which they do, we would ... end up doing a lot more work."

A background check from Oregon State Police would cost $10, said Lt. Josh Brooks, public information officer for OSP.

But because SB 941 is not designed to require an individual to pay OSP directly, any sale must go through a dealer.

The increased workload would likely result in higher costs to consumers, Jobe said.

Plenty of gun laws are already on the books to cover anyone with a violent past, said Micky Garus, owner of American Outdoors in Dallas.

"It's already illegal for them to purchase and possess firearms," he said. "This new law that they're wanting to do, everybody should have to pass a background check for a firearm. It sounds good on the face, but the reality is criminals are already circumventing the system."

Garus said SB 941 and other gun-related bills in the Legislature are examples of trying to "legislate crime."

"It really does nothing but infringe on the liberties of the private citizen," he said.

If passed, the law would do a couple of things to complicate gun ownership, Garus said.

"The system Oregon State Police uses cannot even handle what our shops are doing," he said. "It causes a backup. I had two guns that I got an (approved background check) on. The customers had waited two months to pick up those guns." Jobe agreed.

"It puts a lot of stress on the background system," he said.

Another consequence of SB 941 is gun registration, Garus said.

"The only effective way to regulate this is registration," he said. "They have no clue who has what right now. They won't come out and say, 'we want gun registration,' ... but if the bill passes, they can say under an administrative rule that the only way we can enforce this law is to have these guns registered."

Garus, Jobe and Wolfe agree the situation is frustrating.

"Common sense is not being put forth in this approach, it's just not," Wolfe said.

Budget: State funding is not enough for Falls City

"We've been pretty solid financially for some time," Milburn said. "It (the budget proposal) is not going to cause any major differences."

Democratic leaders have admitted on a number of occasions the funding isn't enough, but say the figure offers most school districts enough to maintain programs and to pay for full-day kindergarten.

"With today's vote we set the floor for funding — not the maximum amount of funding that our schools can get, but the minimum," said Sen. Ron Monroe, the co-chair of the Joint Ways and Means Subcommittee on Education, in a statement after Monday's Senate vote.

The bill has a provision that would send 40 percent of any unexpected revenue increase in the state's May economic forecast to schools. School district leaders are not holding their breath for that, however.

"If we get additional funds, we will have a plan to spend that," Engle said.
