

Igou: Indy Lt. looks forward to new opportunities

 "It's content as well as format," he said. "We want our people to write a good report, prove a good case, make sure somebody gets held accountable for their actions."

Community policing has been part of Igou's professional vocabulary for his entire career, and it shows. There isn't a single house in the city of Independence that Igou can't tell a story about — good or unhappy.

"I would like to say, as I drive through town, that I have more happy memories than sad, but that's not true," Igou said. "Being there when somebody died, or certainly doing CPR on a child and having them die. You almost relive some of those moments from 25 or more years ago. Those imprint on a person, those memories and stories."

In a small town, those memories keep stacking up over and over, Igou added. But being in a small town also has had its protections.

"We don't have as many big-impact, stressful incidents as a big city," Igou said. "Not that we don't have the same type of things, but we don't have the frequency."

Rick Igou shakes hands with McGruff the Crime Dog, played by his son, Alec.

It also has allowed him to see people grow up.

Igou said when people are in their youth — aged 18 to 25 — he may see them on a professional level more often. When they get married and have kids, he is more likely to see them only when they have issues with their neighbors.

"One of the benefits of working in the same community the whole time is you get to see people at their worst and, later, as productive members of society," he said.

One of his favorite parts of his career has been the teaching opportunities, whether training new officers, cadets or reserves, or teaching at Chemeketa Community College or the police academy.

Igou has always been active in improving Independence. Chief Bob Mason awarded him with a Good Neighbor award at the June 9 city council meeting because of his initiative on a project helping a community member.

"Lt. Igou was working a case when he saw a need," Mason said. "He found plumbers, painters, general contractors and worked with local service providers. Then he and his family spent numerous hours at the project themselves, truly leading by example."

This was perhaps Igou's last big project with the police department before he retires from full-time work, Mason said, but really captures how he spent his career.

He has always taken his service to the community seriously, Mason said, leading by example.

Through it all, it's been awesome. Though the 10-year-old Rick did not fully comprehend what it would mean to be a police officer — and he never did get assigned to a motorcycle patrol — the career has been rewarding.

One of the biggest reasons he has been able to get through it with a positive attitude is his high school sweetheart and wife Heidi and his family, son, Alec, 27, and daughter Melissa, 24.

"To be a successful police officer, you have to have the support at home," Igou said. Through the years he has missed a lot of school activities and holidays.

"I am excited he won't be working on the Fourth of July," Heidi said. Instead of riding along on Igou's shift that evening, the couple may take a break from festivities and relax at home this year.

SB 418: Bill looks to create group to study programs

 The programs running now cost the K-12 fund about $19 million per biennium.

Brian Green, Dallas High School's assistant principal who oversees Dallas' program Extended Campus, has a different perspective on fairness. He sees the debate around the proposals as an "urban versus rural" issue with fifth-year programs offering smaller or rural districts a more level playing field with their larger counterparts.

Green said concerns about what would happen to the state school fund if the state's largest school districts launched similar programs are valid — and part of what district and lawmakers were to hammer out before next year's legislative session.

But he said programs like Extended Campus are more critical to smaller districts than those that have the resources to offer students more opportunities for college credit, and career and technical training.

"Districts like the Greater Portland School District have alternative programs to support kids," he said.

Furthermore, Green said the program helps with the state's goals to increase the number of Oregonians earning bachelor's and associate degrees, and offering access to first-generation college students.

Johnson's amendment was proposed on June 2, and two public hearings have been held on the bill since, on June 4 and June 9.

No other public hearings or work sessions are scheduled at this time.

Green said he will join with representatives of those districts who will oppose the latest proposal — including Philomath, Corvallis and Albany.

"It's worth fighting for," Green said. "It's a program that is worth going down swinging for — and we will."
