

Hallett: Wants to boost science

"There's no prescribed way you get into this profession," he said. "In art, you have to make your own career. It was certainly that way for me."

In 1981, Science Digest gave him an opportunity to work on a story about dinosaur discoveries, which led to his work appearing in Life, Smithsonian, and National Geographic. His paintings have toured museums in the U.S., Great Britain, Europe and Japan. In addition to Jurassic Park, he's worked on Disney's "Dinosaur."

Through carving out success in his unusual line of work, Hallett has stayed true to his childhood fascination with how long-gone creatures may have looked. He said he loves doing the research, which he attributes to being "a librarian's kid."

"I was interested in dinosaurs from 4 and a half or 5 years old, when there were little or no good pictures of dinosaurs," he said. "I was fascinated. I wanted to think out in my mind and with my hand what it would look like."

Hallett has not pursued paleontology in a formal sense, but does extensive research to inspire his art, and now, writing.

He's looking forward to talking about his work, and the questions from the audience, especially those from children who share his love of dinosaurs.

"I think their parents are too shy to ask, so the kids ask the really good ones," he said.

He said he's happy to be a spokesman on behalf of science when discussing his work — all of which is based on scientific discoveries.

"Science really needs a boost. People are wary of it," he said. "They don't understand that we really depend on it for our daily lives."

His next paleoart ventures are illustrations and writing for two books about fossil horses and the origins of big cats.

Hallett also cares for animals and plants living now, encouraging animals to live on his property in Dallas, including wild turkeys and osprey. He's planting native Oregon White Oaks around his home as well.

"I'm fascinated by animals," he said. "I'm a closet Dr. Doolittle."

Bikes: One bike per class given away

Fischer said the program started with a donation from Dallas Lion John Hamstreet. He donated a bike for the school district to give away to a student at Oakdale Heights or Lyle Elementary about eight years ago — and he did again this year.

From that beginning, Fischer took on the project.

"Then, a kindergarten teacher and I were talking one day and we are going, one bike, 400 kids, not much motivation," Fischer recalled.

She said the other teacher mentioned at another school, they gave away a boys and a girls bike.

"I said, 'I think we can do better than that,'" Fischer said. "So ever since then we've gone and gotten a bike per class."

This year donors were: Donna Wetter, Shear Perfections, Don and JoAnn Graves, John and Janet Beck, Mary Christensen, Les Schwab, Figaro's Pizza, Mid Valley Eye Care, Mid Valley Dental Association, Stan Schmidt Insurance, A-Team Locksmith, Kings Pump Service and Dallas Lion's Club.

Some donated money anonymously and one donor gave $1,000 this year, Fischer said.

"So many of our donors are year-after-year donor. That just keeps us going," she said. "I'm glad to say that kids are still excited about bikes."

It costs about $100 to buy a bike and a helmet.

Fischer plans to keep the program going as long as possible because it reinforces all the reasons she became a teacher.

Students given bikes during Books for Bikes look at their new bikes.

"It's educational, fun, it gets the kids outside with their bikes doing something active, and it's something that can be passed down through families," she said. "I love it. It sells itself, because it's good for kids."
