Bambinos begins classes, offers more 'adult time'

DALLAS — Like the children the organization serves, Bambinos is growing. The Dallas nonprofit serving children and parents in need by offering essentials and support expanded its office space. It plans to add classes for young mothers, working moms, single fathers and grandparents who are raising young children, and added car seat and safety supplies to its list of items given to clients.

Since July, there's been a new face ready to take in clients, recently appointed Executive Director Heather Seals. She's often accompanied by her young daughter and son at the remodeled office, which now includes a playroom, called the Owl's Nest, and a meeting room.

When asked by former director Beth Jones to consider the position after Seals began volunteering for Bambinos in January 2017, she found the move made sense. Seals became a mother at a young age and is a domestic abuse survivor. She's now happily remarried and raising four children, but has lived in the circumstances many Bambinos clients find themselves.

"I was a mom at 17, so I can relate a lot to the struggles that happen," she said. "It was really a choice of using my gifts and talents and experience that I had, my experience from my younger life. I've been in leadership roles for the last several years, so it just seemed like a natural fit."

Seals said after getting to know the organization and its clients better over the last year, she realized there's a need for more education and "adult time" for Bambinos participants.

offer classes that provide clients with financial management and relationship building skills, and strive to set people free from what she calls the "mindset of poverty."

Seals said she noticed another need among her clients: Connecting with other adults who understand and can help with their struggles. She said she hopes to begin a series of "friendship groups" early this year to allow clients to drop off their children in the Owl's Nest and spend time with other grown-ups. "Let's get together, have coffee, have friends, let the kids play and have that grown up time," she said.

Seals said the expansion in space, services and classes is due to a successful auction last fall. Seals is grateful for that support.

"Ultimately, the impact is going to be on their kids," Seals said. I want to see that cycle of poverty and the mindset of poverty start to change for that next generation in at least as many families as we can."
