Is In Great Demand by Eastern Manufacturing Concerns.

The excellence of this year's clip of Oregon wool forms the subject of a special article in the American Wool and Cotton Reporter, the standard organ of the Eastern mill trade. That paper says:

The bulk of the Eastern Oregon wools, in the matter of grade, runs to fine and fine medium. They are used extensively to mix with Australians. One large manufacturing concern in particular uses several million pounds of them every year in this way, and has purchased them in the original clips this year with unusual freedom, the 1904 clip being exceptionally well grown and in excellent condition. Many of the clips on reaching the seaboard have opened up beautifully, and they have been eagerly sought by other consumers.

"The large concern referred to makes fine worsted yarns, on the German system, and worsted, all-wool dress goods. The Oregon wools, mixed with Australian, are well suited for these purposes, as they are of good staple, especially so this year. They scour out very white, also, ranking with the Wyomings as to whitenessindeed, it is not easy to detect the difference between scoured Wyomings and scoured Oregons, as far as white ness is concerned. As one wool salesman remarked to the writer: Take 10 bags of Wyoming and 10 bags of Oregon, both in the scoured condition, and mark the bags 1, 2 and 3, up to 20, and it would be difficult to pick one from the other.

"There are just as fine wools in Oregon as there are in Wyoming also. Some of the Eastern Oregon wools will grade up to a XX, although they do not have the working qualities of an Ohio XX, which comes the nearest to the Australian of corresponding grade, of any domestic wool. But an Oregon costing 55c or 57c, clean, is much cheaper, of course, than an Ohio XX, which, at present market values, costs about 70c clean.

"The Valley Oregon wool comes in smaller clips, as a rule, and are of comparatively light shrinkage. These wools are raised from sheep which graze on the grass lands in the valleys, and the fleeces are as clean as those grown in Ohio. The sand and dirt do not get into these wools as they do in to the Eastern Oregons, which are grown on ranges, as in Montana. The valleys, however, do not run as fine as the Eastern Oregon, and those that are fine are not as long in staple as the Eastern Oregons of corresponding grade; but the coarser wools grown in the valleys are full as long and strong. In the valleys there is a wider range of grades, they running all the way from an X down to a low quarter blood. Most of the valleys are grown in the western part of the state and they have been unusually well cleaned up this year."
