After boring eight wells on his farm near Dallas, varying in depth from 25 to 175 feet, Ira Stubblefield has at last secured a veritable fountain vein at a distance of only 14 feet under ground. The well filled rapidly after the vein was tapped and the water has stood within two feet of the surface ever since.

The division of the Oregon Basketball League will have the effect of reducing the number of association games played in this city to four, but this condition will not be without its benefits. The Dallas College team will now be enabled to arrange games with many strong Eastern teams, and possibly to make a tour through some of the Coast States. Last year the length of the club schedule made it necessary for them to remain in Oregon and to refuse several challenges from teams touring the coast. Several offers have already been received this year, and Manager Kersey thinks he will be able to arrange dates for all of them, owing to the shortness of the league schedule.
