DALLAS, OREGON, AUGUST 11, 1908.

The way to build up Dallas is to patronize Dallas people.

TAFT'S ACCEPTANCE.

William Taft, the official exponent of Republicanism and its policies, has formally received the announcement that his party has chosen him as such, and in his speech of acceptance, a forceful, frank and comprehensive speech, he has in turn made known to his party his interpretation of its policies as set forth in the platform. And his conception and interpretation of those policies, which he outlines in his speech of acceptance, are such as will give those who have seen fit to elevate him to their leadership, the conviction that they have indeed chosen aright.

Conservative yet progressive (the kind of progress that is stable), the course of action outlined by Mr. Taft, in case the administration shall be given into his hands, presents a striking contrast to the radical policies advanced by his opponent.

Especially marked is this distinction in his declaration of the course that should be pursued in dealing with the threatening rise of plutocratic power in the United States. Especially marked is that distinction, and especially worthy of the attention of the American public, inasmuch as this question bids fair to become one of the principal storm centers in the progress of the present campaign.

Mr. Taft's plan is to "perfect the machinery" by which the moral standards of the business community are to be sustained. He would have it operate so that lawbreaking might be promptly and adequately punished, but would also have it "operate with sufficient accuracy and dispatch to interfere with legitimate business as little as possible." In other words, while he sees the evils already existent and which may yet spring into existence in the future from those sources, he yet recognizes the fact that enormous beneficial influences may also spring from the same sources, and his aim will be, therefore, to regulate and restrain those potent forces in the social organism, so that their powers for good may be retained, developed and utilized, while the evils may be eradicated.

Mr. Bryan, however, his logical opponent, will have none of this. The remedy which he advocates is simply that of destruction. The plutocratic element in the social organism is productive of considerable harm, hence it should be utterly destroyed. By such a method, he would, together with the removal of the objectionable features, which admittedly exist to an alarming extent, wipe out also those other features which, properly handled, would be productive of untold good to the commonwealth. Briefly put, his policy on this phase of the social question is that of burning down the barn to get rid of the rats.

Taft stands for conservative but stable progress. He would begin upon the foundation laid by the preceding administration, a foundation approved by the people as substantial and safe, and he would build with care and caution, a structure that should need no remodeling. Bryan, on the other hand, would lay an entirely new foundation and one whose merits are a matter of doubt; he would rush blindly into the field reckless and radical experimentation.

As the New York Tribune has said: "Mr. Taft is for progress as history makes it, for history is never in a hurry. Mr. Bryan is for progress as agitators and visionaries would always have it, without breathing space for humanity, on the run for perfection. He is for the destruction of anything that does not harmonize with his view of what it should be. Destruction is the quickest way. Mr. Taft is for removing objectional qualities and turning the servicable elements to the use of mankind. Mr. Bryan would destroy the trusts. It is the simplest and most expeditious way. Mr. Taft would compel them to cease doing harm and set them to doing good. Mr. Taft would make haste slowly. Mr. Bryan has only contempt for that ancient summary of all human experience."

Of these two strong, representative characters, Taft and Bryan, the conservative and the radical, the thinker and the visionary, the positive or constructive and the negative or destructive, the one moving in paths known and safe and the other in roads never before tried, there is but little doubt which will be the ultimate choice of the American people, a people who are, we believe, cautious and conservative, but at the same time, positive and progressive.
