THE CLOSING CAMPAIGN.

The presidential campaign with its rallies, its speeches, its straw votes that prove conclusively that both candidates have a walk-over and its sudden startling disclosures from the supporters of either side, that the country is tottering on the verge of certain dissolution (if the candidate from the opposing party is elected) has now entered the final stage of its development and has reached the point where, as Mr. Dooley puts it, 'iverybody runs 'round in a circle an' kicks up such a dust that no wan can forsee the outcome."

Enthusiasm, which has languished throughout the greater portion of the quiet campaign is now tardily aroused. Rally follows rally with bewildering rapidity and with much ostentatious blaring of bands and flaming of red fire, and the spellbinder, aroused at last to unwonted activity, darts hither and thither about the countryside like a perturbed water bug.

Such things as these stir the blood and warm men up into the good old whole-souled partisan enthusiasm of former years, but in all probability, the rallies upon rallies and speeches upon speeches that make lurid the atmosphere of the closing campaign, will have little or no influence in changing the votes of the adherents of either party. The great mass of the voting men have long since reasoned out the course that they intend to pursue in the coming election and the ones that still remain "on the fence" probably would not be strong enough even if they combined their vote on either of the principal sides, to turn the balance of the election. The judgment of the American people has already been passed, although its decision will not be made public until after the ballots have been counted on November 3.

Opinions differ as to just what will be this final decision of the sovereign American people, from which there shall be no appeal, and the straw vote, personal canvas, and computation from the registration books, all of which are favorite methods used by political prophets and soothsayers, throw little light on the subject.

The Observer has, throughout the campaign, supported Mr. Taft, the Republican candidate, and believes today, although it does not claim to be infallible in its judgment, that Mr. Taft will be elected. If it had been equally confident that he was to suffer defeat, it should have supported him just the same, not because of any crowning and excelling merits in the man personally, but because it has unflinching confidence in the merits of the principles he represents.

In the present campaign, the struggle is practically confined to two parties—the Republican and the Democratic. The other parties are negligible quantities. Hearst's Independence League was organized more than anything else to gratify a bitter feeling of malice against a Democratic party that refused to recognize him as a potent and essential element in its organism. It can do nothing in the present campaign but make things uncomfortable for the Democratic party (and occasionally one from the Republican party, also, who chances to fall under the shadow of one of Mr. Hearst's "oily" letters) and it is devoting the best of its energies toward the complete exercise of that prerogative. Debs and Chaflin, of the Socialist and Prohibition party, neither one expects or desires election. Their campaign is nothing more than a minority report.

The real contest, is, therefore, between Taft and Bryan; between the Republican principles and the Democratic principles; the principles of the party that has ruled for years and the one that has for years vainly desired to rule; the party of slow, steady conservative progress and the party of visions and dreams and wierd, radical remedies for such maladies as may beset the body politic.

As radical as is the difference between the policies of the two major parties (and that difference is indeed vast) are the characters of the two men who represent the parties. Taft has been an administrator in offices of public trust that were bestowed upon him unsought and he has, without exception, been a careful conscientious and effective worker. Bryan has been a persistent seeker after offices that fled before him and eluded him like will-o-the-wisps. The one is a stolid, unflinching, slowly (but steadily) progressive force; the other a brilliant, unstable, vacillating and misdirected energy. The one has behind him a record of faithful achievement; the other a record of fruitless effort.

The characters of the two candidates are almost analogous to the characteristics of the parties they represent. The Republican party, cautious and conservative, recognizes abuses, but believes in setting about their removal in such a way that the delicate organism of business prosperity may not be interfered with to any appreciable extent. The Democratic party, rash and radical and inclining toward the wild doctrines of Socialism, would wipe out the abuses at "one full swoop" and risk whatever might befall the settled prosperity of the country as a result. In other words, the one would heal the ulcer with mild medicines that act slowly but surely and do not keep the patient from going about his daily occupation; the other would administer chloroform, cut out the offending spot and leave the patient to recuperate in bed.

And lastly, the administration of President Roosevelt has been not so much one of achievement as of preparation. Under his hand, during the Republican rule, a vast reform movement has been barely set in motion—no more. Mr. Taft stands ready to step into Roosevelt's place and take up and continue the work with a system of machinery that has been prepared and worked down to the finest degree of efficiency through six years of careful selective development. The reform movement under these conditions can go onward without an interruption, to its ultimate conclusion.

Mr. Bryan on the other hand, if elected, would have to construct for himself an entirely new system of executive machinery. In the meantime the reform movement would be at a standstill.

The people of the United States are a progressive people and at the same time a conservative people. They desire that the work of reform should be continued as well as it has been begun and also that the eradication of the evils that beset the nation may be effected without unbalancing or hampering the business prosperity of the nation.

The Observer believes all this and because it believes this; because it has confidence in the safe judgment of the American people as a whole; it believes without resorting to straw votes, personal canvas or computation from the registration books, that the majority of the voters of the United States will cast their ballots in favor of William H. Taft, the Republican party and Prosperity in the coming election.

Citizens of Corvallis, where it is reported, four political rallies have been held this week, certainly should not complain about any tendencies toward chilliness in the presidential campaign.

The following extracts, giving the salient points of the address delivered by Congressman Will H. Humphreys, of Seattle, at the Republican rally in Salem, Tuesday night, are worthy of the consideration of those who may have been inclined in the past, to the contention of brethren of the Democratic faith, that Republican administrations have done nothing to correct the "trust evil" and that the Democratic party is the only one which we may expect to accomplish anything along that line of labor for the public weal.

"The first and only law against trusts was drawn by a Republican statesman, passed by a Republican congress and signed by a Republican president.

"The Democratic party never sees the right side of a question until the question is passed.

"The first message advocating a fight against the trusts was sent by a Republican president, Benjamin Harrison.

"Under Cleveland, the only Democratic president for years, no fight was undertaken against the trusts and when such a fight was taken up by a Republican attorney general the only ones who attempted to counteract its defeat were Democratic judges in the Supreme Court of the United States.

"The only party that has ever attempted to legislate against the trusts has been the Republican party."

Thieves Rob Tent.

While James Jacobson, of West Salem, was in the city Tuesday afternoon, theives entered his tent, stole a shot gun, watch and several minor articles, turned the contents of the tent topsy-turvy and escaped. No clue as to the identity of the theives has yet been secured and it is thought probable that the crime was committed by wandering hoboes, who, after possessing themselves of such articles as they desired, made good their escape into Salem.
