MILKING MACHINE TESTS.

Experiments of Tennessee Station With the Mechanical Milker.
 One after another the experiment stations are taking up the question of milking by machine, with results not altogether in agreement, although generally favorable. The conclusions drawn by the Tennessee experiment station are grouped under nine heads as follows:

- First.—Under conditions existing during the test at the station machine milking has been at least equal if not slightly superior to hand milking.
- Second.—Under average conditions a cow is milked as clean with the machine as by hand. An expert operator can milk cleaner with the machine than the average man will by hand.
- Third.—If the teat cups and mouth pieces are properly adjusted the machine is not injurious to the teats and udder or objectionable to the cows, some even preferring it.
- Fourth.—The machines are not difficult to keep clean, and a high grade of milk is secured when machines are used. If neglected, however, they soon become filthy and are a serious source of contamination.
- Fifth.—One man running two machines is nearly equal to two hand milkers. There is a great difference between the number of cows different men will milk per hour. To secure thorough milking and rapid work the operator should follow the machines closely to see that each cow is milking properly.
- Sixth.—Successful milking with machines depends upon the proper fitting of cups and mouth pieces, the operator being sure that each teat is milking before going to the next cow and thorough manipulation of the udder before removal of the machine. In many cases it is necessary to use a smaller sized teat cup during advanced stages of lactation than when the cow is fresh.
- Seventh.—The operator should be above the average farm laborer in intelligence and mechanical skill.
- Eighth.—Troubles that occur in operating are due more to misuse than to any fault of the machine.
- Ninth.—Some cows give more milk by machine milking and others less. Present knowledge indicates that machine milking is as efficient as hand milking under average conditions. A great deal better yields by machine could be secured if the herd were selected for uniform teats of good size.

ATTACHING THE CUPS.

THE SHEPHERD.
 Put the unthrifty appearing ewes by themselves and give a little extra feed. Perhaps they are suffering from the greed of the bosses in the flock and are not getting a full ration.
Feeding Orphan Lambs.
 It may be more trouble at first, but it is better to teach baby orphan lambs to drink out of a basin than from a bottle, as it will be less trouble as they grow older. The milk should be blood warm and fresh from the cow for the first few days. If any is spilled on their wool it should be wiped off, as the odor of stale milk is unwholesome and disagreeable.
Exercise For Breeding Ewes.
 An old sheep breeder and a successful one says that exercise for the breeding ewe is most essential. No matter how near perfect the ration may be, if exercise or locomotion are will follow. When sheep begin to look ragged and lose wool in spots, better look out for some skin disease.

Twins For Tying Wool.
 At shearing time care should be taken in the character of twine used in tying wool. The leading dealers, both west and east, and manufacturers complain that wrong methods are too often followed. Through effort made a year ago against use of sisal or binder twine in tying fleeces this practice has been largely discontinued. But dealers complain that too much of the wool last year was tied with sisal twine made of old bagging, which is almost as bad as sisal, as it rubs off on the wool and will not take the dye in manufacture. What is wanted is a hard, smooth twine, keeping all tags or foreign matter out of the fleeces.

Not More Than Ten Per Acre.
 The number of lambs to turn into a cornfield per acre depends upon the feed in it. Ordinarily ten lambs will not be too many to eat the pasturage furnished by one acre. Where corn is ripe and the yield is fifty bushels per acre thirty-five or forty lambs are frequently turned in per acre, but this is a different proposition. Here only the pasture and not the entire crop is desired. Lambs are sometimes inclined to trample down the corn in the corner where they are turned in. To avoid their doing this they should be permitted to work into the cornfield slowly and at their own pleasure. If driven hurriedly into a field they lose each other and immediately run as if wild in an effort to find one another.

Call For County Warrants.
