Oregon is coming to the front again as the ideal home for one more product. It is claimed that the Oregon flax is the best grown, and a company has been organized in Salem to buy all offered for sale.

There is no reason why Oregon should not enjoy a year of unusual prosperity. Local conditions are most favorable. According to figures issued by Dr. Withycombe, director of the Experiment station at Corvallis, the value of the agricultural products of the state for the year 1913 amounts to approximately $140,000,000.

Oregon City wants a new charter which will provide her with a salaried manager to administer her municipal affairs. Being a city of some 6000 people she thinks she should be out of the class of towns whose business is run gratis by men who have their own affairs to engage their attention and energy, but who do the best they can for the city's business in off hours.
