Tenting

By EMERSON BURRIS

My doctor told me to go into the country and live outdoors.

To get the whole benefit of the situation I set up a tent. I built a floor with my own hands and did what I could to make my habitation attractive. In this I failed signally. It is not in a man to beautify a home. At any rate, it was not in me. The interior furnishings of mine consisted of a cat and a trunk. As for food, I was encamped on the bank of a stream in which there were plenty of fish, and when I wanted meat I could shoot game, but not near where I was. I had to go quite a distance for that and usually made an all day trip of it.

In the region near about me there were scattered houses, some of them farmhouses, for the country was very beautiful and the air salubrious. The greater part of these houses were now vacant, but there were a number of them occupied. None of them were very near me, or, rather, in selecting a camping ground I got as far as possible away from all of them.

One day, on returning from a hunting trip, on entering my tent I met with a surprise. A dainty little washstand, with bowl and pitcher, stood in one corner, while above it hung a small mirror. Several colored lithographs were pinned to the tent walls. On the floor was a wicker armchair such as is used in summer on piazzas. In the center of the tent was a tiny table, with a lamp on it. I had used a candle.

That some woman had done all this was my first thought; that she had seen me and taken an interest in me was my second; that she was young, comely and otherwise attractive was my third.

These preliminaries having flashed through my mind, I looked about me to observe the cottages nearest me with a view to locating the lady who had made me so comfortable. The surrounding dwellings were all on higher ground and my view of most of them unobstructed by trees. There they were, bathed in the light of the setting sun, but not one of them had a word of information for me. And yet I fancied that concealed in one of them a girl had a pair of glasses fixed on me, watching to see how I acted at the moment of my discovery of her handiwork. So I stood in front of the tent with my face toward the landscape, took off my hat and threw a kiss.

No response came to me. The cottages were as mute as before. But in fancy I heard a musical laugh ringing out on the quiet air.

Building my fire in my improvised range, a number of flat stones, I proceeded to cook my supper, a brace of quails I had shot during the day. I was thinking the while that my benefactress was watching me. And for next day I had proof that she was, for, going to the spring from which I obtained my water supply, on my return I found sticking in the ground a few yards from my tent an arrow and wrapped about it a bit of paper bearing the words:

Leave anything you wish cooked at the store and it will be attended to.

I was not slow in availing myself of the invitation—not that I needed much culinary work done, but because I hoped thereby to get a clew of the cook. But in this I was disappointed. The storekeeper was an old woman, who was very deaf, or pretended to be; at least she turned a deaf ear to my inquiries. The only reply I got was "Tomorrow."

I inferred that I was to come tomorrow for the bird I left, and when I did so I received it deliciously cooked. I will not specify the device I employed to find out who was my benefactress. I made excuses to chat with several of the ladies of the neighborhood. Of one I begged the loan of a needle and thread, of another a little baking powder, of another some quinine. Each and every one of these persons granted my request willingly, but I gained no information from any one of them.

I discovered my girl, however, and by accident, or, rather, by taking advantage of seeing something that gave a clew. Having occasion to visit the express office at the railway station, I saw a box bearing the label of a vendor of sporting goods addressed to a Miss Clara Farnsworth. The size and shape of the box led me to believe that it contained archery goods. I straightway inquired which was the Farnsworth cottage, and my informant directed me to one no nearer and no farther than the rest, but especially well situated to get a view of my camp.

Tagging a bullet with a note of thanks to Miss Farnsworth for her kindness to me, I fired the bullet into a large tree in the front yard of the Farnsworth place. The next day a note came to me through the post from Mrs. Farnsworth acknowledging that the family had seen my camp and could not resist a temptation to make it more comfortable. The lady also extended an invitation for me to call.

I found Mr. and Mrs. Farnsworth's family to consist of one daughter nineteen years old. Now that the secret was out she enjoyed exceedingly my description of my feelings at seeing my tent made more comfortable and at finding the note bearing arrow in my front yard. As I had suspected, she had watched me through an opera glass on both occasions. The laugh I had heard in imagination was a real one, though too far for me to hear.
