Aftermath of the Convict Race

Some incidents in the escape of Jesse Hall, the convict, have come to hand since last week which may interest our readers. We give them below:

At the place where A. F. Huber was compelled to cross the Luckiamute the water is said to be very deep although it is not more than 20 to 40 feet wide and the depth increases gradually although the bank driven down in approaching the stream is very steep.

It has since been ascertained that the flour and bacon found in

Hall's possession was not stolen from the sawmill as reported but was given him by a friend, or at least the donor is held in that light.

The pocket knife given to Mr. Huber was one stolen from the party held up in Corvallis, and has become the permanent gift from the original owner.

G. T. Boothby visited Corvallis and secured his watch but as the sheriff was not at home he did not get his cash returned but expects to get it later.
