Alaska's Coal Development Retarded

The development of the coal resources of Alaska, according to a statement in a report on the mineral resources of the United States issued by the United States Geological Survey, has been held back on account of the lack of legislation permitting the exploitation of the known extensive and valuable fields. In 1912 the commercial product of coal in Alaska amounted to only 355 tons. In addition 900 tons were mined under the direction of the Bureau of Mines for testing by the United States Navy. The imports of coal into Alaska amount to about 100,000 tons annually, but most of the transportation and manufacturing industries of the Territory now depend on California oil for their fuel.
