Burn No More Straw

When farmers apply the torch to their straw stacks they are sending up in smoke plant food to the value of three dollars for each ton burned, according to O. A. C. agronomists. They are also robbing the soils of organic matter that would tend to make them light, porous and easily worked, and greatly increase their water-holding capacity. These values to sad and heavy soils are often as great as the plant food values, thus making the entire worth of the straw about $6 per ton. Let farmers compare this value with the cost of hauling the straw and applying it to the land, and they will burn no more straw. For cultivated crops the straw covered area should be disced and plowed under, but that is a charge on the cultivation fund rather than on the fertilization fund. On meadows and pasture lands the straw may be applied as a light top dressing in the fall. Since much of the material in the straw came from the lands, it must be returned in some form to that land, or the land will become unable to produce profitable crops.
