College Extension Work Reaches Many Thousands

Oregon Agricultural College, Corvallis, July 19.—Almost 104,000 different people, about one-seventh of Oregon's total population, have been reached during the last two years by Agricultural College extension work. The service includes every branch of instruction, including soils and crops, farm livestock, dairying, poultry raising, horticulture, gardening, homemaking, sanitation, crop protection from insect and diseases, rural organization, public school instruction and training, and organizations to promote rural business and social enterprises.

As organized by Director R. D. Hetzel, the extension division carries the College work through lectures, demonstrations and College and press bulletins as well as county agricultural agent demonstration and survey work and the work of organizing and directing the industrial activities of the girls and boys. The county agent work is performed in cooperation with the United States Department of Agriculture and the local county government, and the industrial club work is carried on in cooperation with the State department of Education under Superintendent J. A. Churchill and the United States Department of Agriculture.

There are now thirty-two people giving their entire time to extension work, while the members of the experiment station staff and the resident College instructional staff cooperate in placing the most important and best results of their work before the people of Oregon.

Report on Spring Planting

Portland, Ore., July 15.—The District Forester at Portland, Oregon, announces that a report has just been received from the local National Forest officer, upon the spring planting on Mt. Hebo in Western Oregon, where, upon approximately one thousand acres, according to the report, the results have been unusually good.

It is an established policy of the Forest Service to reforest, by planting small trees or by sowing seed, several thousand acres of denuded land within the National Forests every spring, and the present season's work has been in accordance with this plan. While Douglas fir was the species most largely used in the Mt. Hebo planting, other species also were planted. The weather conditions thus far have been so favorable, that less than ten per cent of the trees have failed to grow. If the trees continue to do as well throughout this their first season, the results will mean exceptionally successful planting for the spring of 1915.

Fresh Fruits of all Kinds, Ice Cream, Sodas, Etc.
