He Found it Cold in Iowa

The following from the Sheridan Sun is self explanatory:

The editor returned Friday evening from his Iowa trip, called there two weeks ago by the death of a brother, firmly convinced that the winter is no time in which to make the journey from the warm, moist climate of Western Oregon to that of the more rigorous weather of the upper Mississippi Valley. Leaving Sheridan with the warm rains falling and the mercury not down to the freezing point, and being projected into a climate where the thermometer registered 25 degrees below zero and the winter blasts forcing the chilling snow down the coat collar, is not a pleasing transition, and strong is the constitution that can withstand the change. But the residents there seemed to enjoy it and were quite enthusiastic in their remarks of "what splendid winter weather we are having," a statement that found no echoing response from our vocal cords as the teeth chattered and the frame shook with the cold. With the snow piled up as high as fences, and ice on the lakes and rivers as thick as a man's height we found no attraction in the winter conditions sufficient to call us back from the state of our adoption. At Minneapolis and St. Paul, the far famed twin cities, beautiful in the summer time, $60,000 had already been expended in removing the snow from the streets of the former city, and the street cleaning department was waging a losing game with the rapidly falling feathery flakes as they were ground into the dirt of the pavement until the mixture resembled soot and gave one the impression he was wading through coal dust. But the people are content; they are wise in their ignorance of better winter conditions elsewhere, and might, if landed here, complain of our warm weather; but the writer will remain loyal to Oregon climate and the pure, crystal fluid that courses down the mountain side and provides the most health giving drink on earth. Good old Oregon!
