Addition of two stories to the supreme court building in lieu of erecting a new structure under prevailing high costs of labor and materials is advocated by Sam A. Koser, secretary of state, in case the state board of control and legislature deem it expedient to provide more room at this time for the accommodation of the several state commissions and departments which are now occupying quarters intended for the convenience of the legislators during their biennial sessions. Secretary of State Koser has estimated that the cost of two additional stories to the supreme court building would be in the neighborhood of $125,000, while the erection of a modern office structure on the capitol grounds would entail an expenditure of not less than $350,000.
