The Lonesome Girl

By CLARISSA MACKIE.

© 1921, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

Miss Dalloe came idly down the hundred wooden steps that led to the beach. Above her rose the bold headland, thrusting into the sound its sand-faced slopes, its crown of cedars, oaks and locusts, where, hidden among the trees was her father's country home; a few other handsome places were scattered along the point of land, the houses concealed in the woods; long flights of wooden steps wriggled down the slopes to bath houses and boat houses, each with little wooden piers running out to meet the tide.

The tide was coming in rapidly; in fifteen minutes it would surround the big rock that marked the outpost for safe bathing. The beach was deserted and a cold wind was coming out of the northeast, yet poised on the big rock a girl's slender figure was silhouetted against the primrose of the evening sky. Paula Dalloe frowned.

"Little fool!" she muttered impatiently, and ran down the remaining steps to the hard white sand; when she reached the big rock she drew back from the flying spray as the waves rolled against the base.

"Can you swim?" she called to the girl on the rock.

The girl turned a pale, determined face. "No," she said flatly.

"Then you must come down at once—you will be drowned!"

"It doesn't matter," said the other dully, and turned away to stare at the far horizon.

"Why—how absurd!" The girl spoke over her pretty shoulder, impudently.

"Does it matter to you—particularly?"

"Of course—don't you think you had better come down and talk things over with me—you might change your mind."

"Never—never—never!" cried the girl passionately. "There is nothing to care for—no one to care—it's my own life—if I want to go—that way; it's my business."

"We cannot shout at each other this way—come down for a while, and if you must go back later—very well—it's your life," suggested Paula.

"If you won't interfere with my going back—I'll come for a while—the tide is so slow," conceded the girl as she slipped wearily down the shore side of the rock and joined the other. They sat down on the sand in the afterglow of the pale sunset.

"Who are you?" asked Miss Dalloe, with a puzzled look at the small elf-like figure, the really beautiful face and sad eyes of the girl. "I've seen you somewhere."

"You saw me last night—I was singing in the chorus of the 'Sea Maid' at the entertainment in the big house yonder." She nodded toward a glimpse of red-tiled roof in the distance.

"Ah—at the Eallings—I remember; you were the smallest girl, at the very end."

The girl nodded. "Who are you?" she asked bluntly.

"Paula Dalloe."

"Your father the rich Dalloe—you live up here?" She glanced up the slope.

"Didn't you want to return with the company this morning?"

"No; I was sick and stayed over. They were kind; the housekeeper sent me to the beach to get the air, and I thought it was the best way out."

"Out of what? Tell me, please," Paula smiled and laid her strong brown fingers on the delicate hand of the younger girl.

"Everything! I am all alone in the world— orphan asylum—you know—and then the stage—and I met him—he's fine—the best in the world—but we lost each other. I know his name, but I won't seek him, because—"

"Because—?"

"Well, I'm not in that class, Miss Dalloe. I haven't had much education, but he said it didn't matter, because my heart was right, and I'd learn, and we'd be happy. He told me about his house, and how, when we were married, I would be the mistress. It scared me—I was afraid of all the folks he knew—and so I left the company I was with and ran away—and he never could trace me. This is two years ago, but it hurts yet." She stared straight ahead with unseeing eyes.

"I am sorry," said Paula gently. "Don't you think you should let him know where you are—he may be very unhappy."

"I couldn't. I'm not his sort. When we were together it seemed easy, but after he went I thought of his grand friends and the disgrace I would bring upon him."

"I am afraid you haven't treated him very well."

"He has forgotten by this time," said the girl suddenly.

"Will you tell me your name?"

"Evalyn Clark."

"Won't you come and stay a few days with me, Evalyn, up at my house? Perhaps the change will do you good. You can telephone to your manager."

"Visit you?"

"Yes."

"I cannot. I hurts me to go into people's homes. I never had one—nothing but the asylum and cheap boarding houses. It is nice of you to ask me. I'm only in the chorus, Miss Dalloe, but it makes me sick for a home, so I've thought that my life is my own, and I'd go to my own folks and not be lonesome any more. You understand?" She arose, poised for flight.

"Yes, but you must not take your life—"

"You said I could go back," defied the other as she went away.

A footstep sounded on the steps above. Paula sighed relievedly as she waved a welcoming hand to the young man in white flannels. She almost loved Barry Lane at that moment—she had dallied dangerously with the question for months—for he was so dependable, so sure to be there when needed. Now he could take the obdurate girl and convince her that her life did matter. She watched his keen, dark face as he gasped a few words of the story. "Save her, Barry, if you love me," she ended weakly as she followed his flying steps.

As he reached the top of the rock the girl leaped into the water, now pounding against its gray sides. It was Paula who brought her in, struggling, defiant, like a half-drowned kitten.

"Take her, Jerry, while I wring myself dry," she panted as she laid the little chorus girl in his arms.

His silence surprised her. He was looking down at the wet face, with its dark, wet curls, its wide, joyous eyes; his own eyes were incredulous.

"Evalyn—darling—I've searched the world for you—I'll never let you go again." He was kissing her.

"Barry—Barry—I wasn't running after you," protested the proud little voice.

Paula Dalloe saw them together; weighed their love for each other against her portion of wealth, position and possible happiness, and a wry little smile edged her perfect lips. She shivered in the cold wind.

"Come—home, Evalyn and Barry," she urged, smiling down at them as the man carried his love up the long flight of steps; and the girl that went before, who had so nearly loved him, remembered how her ancestors had fought grim battles with smiling faces set to the foe, and as she went forward there was courage in her eyes and a gallant swing to her shoulders.

"Come—home," she said again.

CALLS CANDY VALUABLE FOOD

Certain It Is That Enormous Energy Is Contained in a Small Portion of Sweets.

If there is any doubt as to the food value of candy, the statement, which bears the stamp of science and investigation, that a man may walk a mile on the energy furnished by one caramel, provides food for thought.

The exact amount of energy produced depends, of course, upon the kind of candy eaten and the nature of the ingredients which enter into its composition.

That candy is an energy producer was demonstrated many times in the recent war. The authorities, not wishing to feed the fighters stimulants that would lessen their resistance, gave them candy and jams in large quantities. Practical tests of the value of sugar in preventing or delaying fatigue were made, the results indicating the value of sugar in the ration when men are subjected to great exertion.

Chocolate bars are one of the most convenient forms in which sugar may be carried; they pack readily and carry much concentrated nourishment for their weight, making them a favorite with mountain climbers and hikers who do not wish to load themselves with large quantities of food, and if one caramel will supply enough energy for a man to walk a mile, it will be seen how comparatively light the load may be. The Swiss guide considers lump sugar and highly sweetened chocolate an indispensable part of his outfit.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Far Sighted.

A railway employee was in the witness box, and was being cross-examined by a very self-important young lawyer about a case which had resulted in a damage suit as the consequence of an accident on the railroad.

"You say that you saw this man fall from the train?" said the lawyer.

"I saw him fall, yes," replied the railway man.

"Yet it was night time," insisted the lawyer. "And you were at one end of the train and the man was at the other. Do you expect an intelligent jury to believe such a yarn? How far can you see at night?"

"About a million miles, I think," replied the railway man. "I can see the moon. How far is that?"

The lawyer retired.

South Sea Islands.

On the more than three score Tuamotu islands dwell fewer than 4,000 people. The largest of these atolls, Rangiroa, has a lagoon 45 miles long and a third as wide. Pearl oysters abound and the pearls are sold in Tahiti.

The Tubai or Austral Islands lie in a crescent chain, from northwest to southeast, and support not more than 2,000 Polynesians. Explorers have found certain stone structures on the summit of Rapa, in this group, of considerable interest. The principal island gives its name to the group; Vavatoa and Ruruta are the others of appreciable size. The land area of the entire group is but 110 square miles.—National Geographic Society Bulletin.

1000 Homeless in Fire.

Ardmore, Okla.—Fire early Monday morning wiped out the business section of the town of Dillard, located in the heart of the Hewitt oil field, causing damage to the amount of $100,000. More than 1000 persons were made homeless. Six two-story buildings and more than a score of small dwellings occupied by field workers' families were destroyed.
