LUTHERAN STUDENT CENTER

Wm. Schoeler, Pastor
Phone, Independence 110-R

At the Sunday school next Sunday, which opens at 10 o'clock, a brief lecture will be given on "The Ten Commandments"—their history and nature, their purpose and authority. It is hoped that a goodly audience will be in attendance.

A preaching service follows the Sunday-school and begins at 11 o'clock. The topic of the sermon will be "The Beginning," based upon the first verse of the Bible. Man, naturally, asks for an account of the universe in which he lives, and the answers that have been given are many and often grotesque. What is the Biblical answer? Is it sufficient, does it stand to reason? A cordial invitation is extended to all seekers after the truth to come out and weigh the evidence.

We have received word from Silverton that Emanuel's choir will be with us March 13, at 2:30 p. m., to give us a song service lasting about two hours. This song service will be rendered free of charge and everybody is welcome to listen in. Since a number of the singers are ex-members of the celebrated St. Olaf choir, we may all look forward to a rare treat.

The Lutheran Student Center is at Monmouth, in the old Odd Fellows hall above the postoffice, and meetings are being conducted every second and fourth Sunday in the month, from 10 to 12 a. m.

* A Good Motto.

Life is a dream.
Fortune a bubble,
But if love lights beam
They'll banish all trouble.

Love is the foundation
On which all things are based
Hate is the sword
By which happiness is defaced.

So, wish not for riches on earth
But glory above,
And let your life's motto be:
Freedom, truth and love.

—Virginia Coats

Charts are Made For English Classes

The eighth grade English class has been divided into two equal sides, the reds and the blues, for a contest in penmanship, on their English papers. Miss Downing, their teacher, has made a chart on which there are two thermometers, one for each side. They show the daily progress of the pupils. At the present time the "reds" are ahead.

An intelligent looking old owl in the center of the chart is working the children up by degrees with his questions that are as puzzling to his pupils as our English questions are to us.

The 7th English class has a chart also where the grades are placed daily by Miss Gant, their teacher.

A calendar for the room has been made by Miss Wilson, the reading teacher. A "Lincoln" suggestion makes the calendar very attractive and interesting.

AN ACKNOWLEDGMENT

The following letter addressed to Miss McIntosh, was sent by the U. S. veteran's hospital in Portland.

"We wish to take this opportunity to thank you and your Junior group for the supply of candy bags and the Christmas tree decorations which were sent to the patients of this hospital. The bags were filled with delicious home made candy and hung on the gaily decorated Christmas trees and we can assure you that each patient received a generous helping.

"We had a very jolly Christmas program here at the hospital and it was due mainly to the generosity of the various groups and organizations throughout the state who contributed many gifts and goodies to the occasion."

JOKES

Mr. Johnston (after telling of the mothers and fathers he has met.) I have met a big part of Alvin's family but he's the only one.

Mr. Cameron (in arithmetic class): What does 5 x n equal?
Jim: 5 pies.

A pupil (in history class, the conversation being on radios) You can get Los Angeles from Ohio.

Inez: Oh! that's nothing. Once I got Chile!

Thelma (finishing a very interesting story.) And the little boy threw his line over the side of the boat. He felt something tug at the end of the string. And what do you suppose it was?

Wilma (absently) I bite—
Thelma: That's what the other poor fish did.

A City's Great Drive Against Plague of Rats

By A. E.

It was a cold evening in late November at Silverhill, a mountain resort in the mountains of northern Wyoming. Everybody was comfortably seated around the giant fireplace reading or chatting.

Suddenly the door opened and in rushed thousands of rats, squeaking all in different sharps and flats. In a mad scramble there was a rush for the tops of tables and for rooms adjoining.

The next day the men assembled and discussed ways and means of getting rid of the rats. Everybody tried to solve the problem, but in vain. They met for several days but still they thought of no way out of their predicament. At last a small boy fought his way through the hordes of rats and went to the meeting where his little idea was accepted.

The women baked bread for many days, in fact, till the flour was a thing of the past. The men took the bread and made a trail of its pieces leading out to a narrow peninsula, extending far out into the swift river. The rats followed the trail and were soon eating the bread out at the end of the peninsula. Here the men and boys worked hard to build a wall to prevent the return of the rats. The rats tried to scale the wall but it was too slippery and too high. They tried to swim, but in the swift current all were drowned. So ends the rats tale.

Our Debate

If you had been an eighth or ninth grade pupil in the advanced room in the Training school, Friday afternoon January 28, you would have enjoyed a debate with the rest of those pupils. The question was: Resolved that the United States should not withdraw her troops from Nicaragua.

The sides were as follows:
Affirmative: Clyde Davis, Albert Elder, Jack Clark.

Negative: Florence Hochberg, Joe Rogers, Virginia Coats.
Judges: Miss Brooks, Miss White, Miss Stark.

All of the debaters were from the ninth grade except Jack Clark who was from the eighth grade. The judges were student teachers from the advanced room. They decided for the negative.

The debate was very successful and gave evidence of hard work on both sides to secure the necessary material. Another debate will take place in a few weeks.—L. F.

Teacher (In agriculture class) Some one pull up a clover plant for our next lesson, so as we can see the little gas factories on the roots.

Miss McIntosh: No, not gas factories. What is it? Anyoné?
Bright Pupil: Noodles.
