The High Cost of Living.

Contrary to the belief of many Americans, the high cost of living is felt in other countries besides ours. It has caused demonstrations in Vienna which called out the military and which compelled the government to proclaim martial law for the first time since 1849. Riots for the same cause have recently taken place in France, Spain and Italy. Political leaders in Germany say that the burdens of the average man in that country are becoming unbearable, and they predict uprisings which may recall the insurrections of 1849. Belgium and England have recently had strikes which had at their base a feeling by the people that the cost of existence was making life intolerable.

These demonstrations in Europe ought to make the Americans a little more reasonable in their condemnation of the conditions in their own country. The situation of which they complain is world-wide. Moreover, our hardships are small compared with those of other peoples. Government is less to blame for these ills than it is elsewhere. Our tax burdens are far lighter than are those of the British, the French or the Germans. Our ability to meet them is immeasurably greater than theirs. The outlook for improvement in these conditions is much brighter in the United States than it is in any of the great countries of Europe.

One cause of the relatively high cost of living is the increase in taxation, local and national, but, as before stated, this factor is less evident here than it is in the old world. Another, and a far larger cause, is the falling off in food production. In all the great countries of the world the growth in manufacturing is far greater than that in agriculture. While this tendency is irreparable in England, Germany and other industrial nations of Europe, it can be remedied in the United States because of the large areas still open to cultivation and of the chances for improvement in agricultural methods. Improvements are being made already. Production per acre in wheat, corn, cotton and other staples is increasing. The growth is slow, but it is continuous. Scientific methods of production may be relied upon to bring "scams pastus" out of the academy and to avert any such outbreaks as the old world has seen recently.
