

When Buying a Piano Get Satisfaction Rather Than a "Bargain"

Some people are induced by misleading advertisements and shady selling methods to buy a Piano at a "special" price, thinking they are getting a bargain. In the end they find they really paid a high price because the instrument was so inferior that it gave out completely in a few months, requiring the purchase of a good new Piano.

It takes good materials, honest workmanship and expert knowledge to make good Pianos—and these cost money. You can't get something for nothing—Pianos are no exception to this universal rule.

But how are you to judge the quality of a Piano? Very few people know about scale design, plate construction, actions, felts, veneers and varnish work. After all, does not your permanent satisfaction lie in the selection of a reliable Piano House—one who is known to carry good dependable makes, who stands back of them, whose prices are fair and represent full value for the money expended?
