Portland—The way Portland's new trans-Pacific freight service helps Oregon industries is exemplified by a recent experience of the American Brush company of this city. When the price of hog bristles rose in China, the company started bringing its shipments direct to Portland instead of through Puget Sound and found that the freight cost saved just balanced the rise in the price of bristles. So the price of brushes was not affected.

Half of the brooms made in the east and brought into Oregon to be sold are made on handles turned in Oregon factories and shipped east.
