Spread of the Bible.

Whatever view we may take of higher criticism, the spread of the Bible will go on. It will be read as a story even by those who do not regard it as a sacred book. The tales of the Patriarchs and of the great men of Israel will not easily fade out of the human early world. They will not easily fade out of the human mind. They bring to us the poetry of the early world. They have the primitive glow. It was not merely as a missionary that George Barrow carried the Bible throughout the length and breadth of Spain. It is not solely as a religious book that 180,000,000 Bibles have been accepted from the British Bible Society, and that a steady flow of 16,000 a day pours forth from their depots. It is partly as the most human of all documents handed down by the human race. There is very little pure dogma in the Bible. Most of the dogmas of the churches were evolved in the succeeding centuries, struck out like sparks by the application of the precise Greek mind to an Oriental theme. We listen to the story of human life in all its variety and pathos, and from there grow, like flowers from some rich soil, the great utterances on life and conduct which still acts as pillars of fire to lead us on. From the rooms of the Bible Society this flood of books goes forth like water to irrigate the world. It spreads out gradually, carried by missionaries and colporteurs, translated into every tongue, carried across deserts and seas—and with it the light spreads too. A Bible is left on some island, and there for the first time the islanders have a literature. It is placed in a prison, and there the weary captive, reading it in some listless hour, finds light and hope. We talk about the "trade" following the flag. The trade we speak of is not always of the best. But here is a trade which will not shame any flag—a trade in something more precious than rancies and brighter than diamonds.—London Daily News.
